INTRODUCTION

THIS book is published by the 362nd Infantry Association. One of the immediate purposes of the Association, it was announced at the time of its organization, would be the publication of a short synopsis of the regiment's history, together with a complete roster of all members of the Association and also the names, so far as known, of the regiment's honored dead. This book is the fulfillment of that promise.

Publication was delayed in an effort to secure a full list of the dead. Complete records were lacking and it is feared that not all are recorded herein.

Because of the limitations, this work is a story, rather than a history. No attempt has been made to give a detailed account of the many noble things accomplished by individuals or separate units. For this reason, innumerable incidents and brilliant exploits that would add much life and luster to the work have not been mentioned.

It is hoped, however, that the general outline contained herein will furnish a narrative from which each veteran of the 362nd Infantry may recall his own living, throbbing, experiences; refreshed by the reading of this narrative.

To the general reader this work is presented as a short, authentic account of the Regiment's part in the Great World War.

For the greater part of the material contained herein, the publishing committee is indebted to the kindness of Captain C. K. McClatchy, Jr., and Chaplain Fred W. Hagan. Chaplain Calvin S. Smith furnished many of the pictures and the chapter on the Burial of the Dead.

CAMP LEWIS

TWENTY-FIVE years hence when little Bill is sitting upon your knee and he springs, "Grandpa tell me a soldier story," you'll not have to disappoint the lad by racking your memory which is hardly surviving the strain; but will take down from your library the History of the 362nd Infantry and record in detail the heroic days of 1918-19. If you are still suffering from shell shock you can probably look to the book for inspiration. On the other hand, if you are one of those "brave soldiers" perchance this history will retard your imagination from the irresistible tendency to tell a whopper. By all means, fill him with a wholesome respect for the glory of American arms, and the 362nd Infantry. Get the essential facts straight or else the boy will come back at you with embarrassing questions, such as, "Grandpa, who helped you win the war?" The main purpose of this history is to record the facts as we found them. To be sure most of the fun had to be manufactured, but a laugh could be found in almost any situation, however hopeless and disagreeable. It wasn't funny then but there is a touch of humor to the stories now. One of our Lieutenant Colonels who could not refrain from ducking his head every time a shell went over remarked, "I am getting to be"—and he ducked as a shell pierced the air overhead—"a regular damn coward."

Come back with us, then, to Camp Lewis; come over to France. Get into the old ramble shacks again where you argued for standing room with the cows and chickens. Get down into the trenches once more; roll around in the muddy old muck holes. Sleep on a cold floor of Hommes 40—Chevaux 8—our parlor car specials. Sample again the cold "Corn Willie." See if the canned "gold fish" is any less delicious than it used to be. Growl and grumble as you used to and then—laugh, as you used to. "On that memorable day," you should begin, "in the summer of 1917, a host of other civilians: mountaineers, cow-punchers, street-sweepers and city folks, knowing nothing of military life and caring less, answered the call of Uncle Sam to show the world—Germany in particular—the meaning of the famous fourteen points." You probably experienced no patriotic thrill as you and your trainload of comrades, mostly in old clothes, with little handbags and bundles containing the things Mother thought necessary to military life, pulled into the quiet wooded Camp Lewis. A mob of boys of all nationalities and creeds made up the breezy westerners from eight of the wildest western states in America. Those boys couldn't keep step, of course; they could scarcely line themselves in a column of twos—they couldn't have licked Germany on that afternoon!

The first Presidio officers training camp in San Francisco opened May 10, 1917, and enough men reported to fill a dozen or more companies—these later became the officers of the famous 362nd Infantry, and, rightfully enough, our history should begin with the first and second companies which formed the First Battalion at the Presidio. With few exceptions, the men picked to officer the 362nd Infantry were from the First Battalion at the Presidio.

As far as data affords information, the following officers are known to have come from the regular army: 1st Lt. Earnest M. Johnson and 1st Lt. Alexander McGee. The first officer's payroll at the end of September, 1917, showed the following names:

Colonel Pegran Whitworth
Lt.-Col. William H. Jordon
Major Godfrey R. Fowler

Major Gordon S. Finley

MEDICAL DETACHMENT

Captain Louis L. Syman
 1st Lt. Daniel R. Campbell
 1st Lt. Harry M. Coleman
 1st Lt. Theo. G. Howe
 1st Lt. Leon B. Collier

A few of the above-named officers were soon transferred to other organizations and their places filled by men coming from the Presidio and other training camps in America.

There was no band at the station at Camp Lewis as there had been from the little towns and cities which marked the glorious "send-off" offered by our home folks. Often have you recalled the picture of the little old tent where you registered the first "short arm" inspection upon your arrival at camp, and, twelve months later, you filed solemnly through the communicating trenches in the darkness, single file, five paces apart, every man keeping contact, reliable, dependable. What a change, eh?

The first contingent of five per cent of draftees arrived at American Lake September 8, 1917, before the camp was completed. What man of the regiment will forget his first medical examination, and the "five shots" in the arm?

"Fall Out—Keep Packs On"—Division Hike April, 1918

And the first lecture on American citizenship? And the first night in camp? Barracks were being constructed of piles of dirt and rocks. The whole place was in a general state of confusion. Many will remember with some dismay the rainy season, yet that seems but a trifle when compared with the dust of Camp Lewis and the mud and rain encountered overseas. The second bunch of men from the first draft arrived at Camp Lewis on September 21, 1917. A much larger number than the first five per cent. The later arrivals were jeered with such remarks as "Hello Rookie;" "Wipe out that smile;" "Keep your head and eyes off the ground." But the spirit of these rookies was evident by the signs painted on the Pullmans in which they arrived: "From Powder River to Berlin;" "To hell mit the kaiser;" "We are going to lick the kaiser." A regular army sergeant ordered these boys without a moment's delay into the bath house, QUICK. "Oh, but I've had a bath."

"I don't care what you did last year; you're in the army now."

"Hard luck! You've got to take another!"

Almost the first words uttered by the new recruit: "When do we eat?" It was the soldier's first concern—his stomach. And later; on the march, in battles; and the doughboys' victorious greeting to the armistice: "When do we eat?" Certainly the first words spoken at Camp Lewis. He ate, and ate well, astonished at first to find so few beans, popularly rumored as the basis of army fare. To be sure, he was served "a thousand on a plate," very early in the game. However, much as he despised them then he would have later given his overcoat for a special plate of those he earlier spurned. The bank clerk was suddenly surprised to find his arm wrapped affectionately around the sheep-herder; the street-cleaner put up with the big farmer, and later they dug funk holes together in the Argonne and the street-cleaner felt mighty sad when his buddy, the big-hearted farmer, "went west."

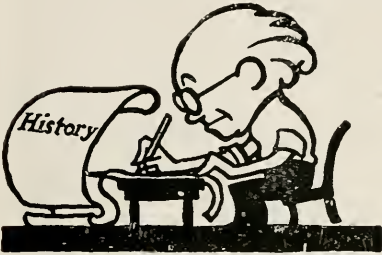

"Lights out! Get to bed!"

The same tough army sergeant who greeted you at the train, threw you into the bath and ordered you to bed, ordered you out again. This was a bit too soon to curse the buglers. There weren't any. It was after hearing reveille blown a countless number of times that you dreamed of the happy days to come, back into civil life, when, disgustingly wealthy, you could hire a bugler of your own, throw a brick at him, roll over and sleep as long as you d— pleased. You arose and made your own bed—a new experience—waving three blankets and a bed sack. Thank heaven! there were no sheets and pillows to battle with—but soon the buglers were to receive their first cursing. The keen eye of the first sergeant, and the hard-boiled second Looie, and the exalted atmosphere of the Captain, all helped to make the first days in camp more restless. Ranch owners, business men, and bankers arriving in the second contingent found themselves in the squads of their Corporal "hired hand"—employees—and clerks.

Two Years in the Making

The first nausea resulting from the shots in the arm—the strangeness of the camp—and the first night of homesickness—took the pertness out of the men, but it returned in a few days as you can see by the following:

A rookie on guard duty at night after a few days' training: "Halt! Who is there?"

"Officer of the camp."

"Halt! Who is there?"

"Officer of the camp."

"H-halt! Who in the devil are you, anyhow?"

"OFFICER OF THE CAMP."

"Then get to hell out o' here, quick; my orders is to challenge three times and then shoot."

The early camp days were filled with trying experiences for some of the boys, and homesickness caused many a bitter, scalding tear to be shed in the darkness of the new-smelling barracks. Many had never spent a night away from home in their lives before. The officers seemed harsh and even cruel with the strict discipline. And the army regulations, guardhouses, court-martials, and company punishment, were held before the boys continually as the reward for disobedience. When the men started from their home towns to Camp Lewis, they were given great send-offs; bands played, the people cheered, and food and entertainment were furnished to top off patriotic speeches. It was a glorious feeling to be a soldier. But at Camp Lewis things looked entirely different the first few days. Military clothing was scarce. Quite often the boys drilled in their civilian clothes, which naturally was a shock to their pride. They had expected to don new uniforms the minute they stepped into camp, which would make them real soldiers, they thought, and it never occurred to many that there would be hour upon hour of drill until they would grow tired and sick of it all. It didn't take long for them to find out they were only the rookiest of rookies.

The qualification cards which showed a man's entire pedigree and which took many hours to make out, also revealed a surprising assortment of humorous dope. Names ran the gamut of the alphabet, backward and forward. It is said that a lieutenant calling the roll of his company happened to sneeze. Four men answered: "Here!"

Side by side, on one company roster, perched a Parrot and Peacock. There was a Mason, a Brewer, and a Singer; a Jewel and a Penny. One of the first corporals turned out was named Trainer; and Bosch was a good soldier, despite his name. Fries made an excellent cook, but how appropriate that Piper should have become a bugler!

Well, because the qualification cards were a lovely color, and beautifully theoretical, they did provide some amusement. Questioned as to his age, one boy answered, "Twenty-seven;" and asked when he would be twenty-eight, he scratched his head, utterly baffled, and ventured, "May or December."

A few days after arrival, a private calling to the orderly room was asked if, within his military experience, he had attended any schools. "Yes," he replied; "School of the Squad and School of the Soldier." The first lectures given were those coming under the heading, School of the Soldier. The men were taught courtesy, respect, obedience, the position of the soldier at attention, right face, left face, about face, and the fundamental setting-up exercises. Some learned rapidly; they seemed to have the faculty of grasping every detail and immediately putting it into practice. There were always a few men in each company who could not grasp the lessons. Their minds worked slowly and they could never get their feet and arms to follow the commands given them. This caused them to be "bawled out" many times each day, to the amusement of their comrades, when they were separated from the others and given individual instruction. If this were the end of the story it would be sad indeed, but let it be said on these pages that a number of those slow ones of the 362nd Infantry proved themselves heroes on the hillsides of the Argonne and in the turnip fields of Belgium. If they were the laughing stock of the company at Camp Lewis, quite often they became the popular ones in France.

Rookies—"Isn't it too heavy for one to carry, Sir?"

OVER LAND AND SEA TO ENGLAND

FOUR o'clock on the afternoon of June 23, 1918, was the first "zero hour" for the 362nd Infantry, for at that hour we started on our seven thousand mile trip to the trenches. Pullman cars afforded good sleeping accommodations, but not for nearly a year later did we again have "sleeping accommodations" while traveling. The trains—yes, it took more than one—traveled over the Milwaukee railroad to Chicago; over the New York Central to Buffalo, and over the Lehigh Valley Line to New York City. At various places along the route stops were made and the men were allowed to indulge in physical exercise. Once, near the Dakota and Minnesota line, they had a half-hour's plunge in a river, a much-needed and appreciated diversion. Miles City, Aberdeen, Milwaukee and Erie gave the boys a royal welcome with a flood of sandwiches and hot drinks, and on the 1st of July everybody was anxiously waiting on the banks of the Hudson at Camp Merritt for further orders. Medical examination, new equipment, fake passes to the big town, and our first overseas caps kept the men pretty busy the few sultry days they were about the camp. Farm boys from Montana suddenly had numerous relatives and urgent business calling them to New York, while others secured passes, and still others saw the city on their nerve. The girls from Broadway played capers with the homesick lads and not a few were married—for two days—suddenly to be snatched away as orders for embarkation ended days that seemed years of bliss—oh! cruel world! A year later those who did not muster courage to propose then, lost no time as the old boat landed its cargo on good old U. S. A. Tired of the butterfly life of the Great White Way and numerous reports that French girls had captivated every American soldier, made proposing easy now and for two weeks while at Camp Mills the suburban clergy earned easy fees pledging "blind lovers" to law and order in the desert wilds of roaming Montana. Some of the men of "E" Company who had never heard of anything but blackleg and hog cholera, now broke out with the measles and so on that 5th of July these men were left behind and the regiment loaded down with excess luggage began the four-mile hike to Alpine Landing, which may well be styled the beginning of Duty's endless demands upon the endurance of the boys of the 362nd. The regulation pack of sixty pounds had suddenly been augmented to seventy-five and eighty, with numerous "extras" each man then held dear. The men looked back on this with a degree of disgust when later in France they had learned to discard even necessities rather than be burdened under the mule gruelling they were forced to endure. One first sergeant made a bugler carry a two-quart bottle of ink the entire distance from Tacoma to Recourt and then discovered that the army issued little tablets which, when added to water, made the best kind of writing fluid. The first sergeant had heard that they didn't use ink in France—and how was he to perform his precarious duties without a pen and good American ink? For days some of the Chinamen on board, as they peered their heads out of the portholes below, were greeted with a splash—and part of the contents of the ink bottle had spread itself recklessly over the smooth brown skin and short hair of our oriental friends. Disfigured for life—for the Chinaman never comes in contact with water—was it any wonder, then, that the boys had to pay one dollar for a single pie—some served with and some without—filling.

First Class Passage

The river ferries that carried the regiment from Alpine Landing to the piers in New York harbor, past the famous old General Cornwallis house, Old Fort Washington, Fort Lee, and Grant's tomb, carried a cargo of western boys too tired to be thrilled in passing such historic ground; yet as the Statue of Liberty came into view she brought forth a volley of song—"We won't come back till it's over, over there."

Transferred from the squatty little "river liners," the boys soon found themselves aboard the Empress of Russia, fresh from the Pacific, ready to make her maiden voyage across the Atlantic. On board were a few government officials from the far East, on their way to England.

The 91st Division sailed from New York July 6, 1917, in the largest convoy that up to that time had crossed the Atlantic. Silently dropping down New

R. M. S. Empress of Russia

York Bay and later clearing Sandy Hook, destroyers circled round, aeroplanes whirred overhead, and one sausage balloon floated lazily along with the ships until the battle cruisers joined the outfit where the ground swells began.

Our Convoy

Those fourteen ships, camouflaged with weird stripes and splotches, were packed with doughboys, jammed down the holds in four and five-tier bunks—America's untried, off for the war. From the 6th of July until the evening of the 17th, the ships leisurely and carefully picked their way across the Atlantic. Life-boat drill each day; the constant wearing of life preservers; the poor food; religious services on Sunday; cleaning ship; getting sick; getting better; setting-up exercises; peering for submarines; watching the ships zig-zag in their course, spent the time, along with carefully guarded games of "black-jack" and constant speculation about trench life.

And must even the portholes be closed tight! Phew! It's stuffy enough below decks with 'em open! Just look at what we've got to sleep in! Row upon row, double tier, scarcely room between those dividing boards for the shoulders to fit in, to say nothing of letting one roll over and be comfortable.

"As for those portholes, keep your hands off them—shut or open. Nobody but the crew is to touch them; they will open 'em up in the morning and close 'em up at night."

"—and no man will be allowed to carry matches. Hand over all you have." (Wonder if he knows they are on sale at the canteen down on Deck D?)

"—and don't throw anything overboard—cigarette butts, papers or food scraps." (Perhaps it is that the hungry submarine crews, long at sea and scenting food, will track us.)

"Put your life-belt on—no, you've got it hind side before. Tie it down securely so that it won't crash up against your chin and break your neck when you have to jump into the sea. Don't take it off until you reach Liv—er, er, until you land."

"Keep your bunks policed constantly and lay out your equipment in the manner prescribed, each morning. Get out on deck by eight-thirty, and stay out."

"Your green card that you got at the gangplank shows what your sitting is in the mess hall. Be on time, or you're out of luck." Etc., etc. (Extract from "Ship Regulations.")

Some of the boys had been in the army only two short months, and one of these while on guard duty one night challenged a colonel as follows: "Hey, youse can't go past dis gate!"

"Is that the way you have been taught to challenge? Who's your captain, anyway?"

"Captain Evans."

"I should judge as much."

"Oh, I see; you're one of them there lootnants. Pass on."

"What do you call this?" asked the Colonel, indicating the silver eagle on his shoulder.

"Oh, er—er," stammered the sentry. "Why, it's a bird!"

Besides keeping "ship regulations," the men found time to hang on the rail and muse over the brave spirit of friend Columbus and to help the Chinamen coin money by buying their stolen pies at one dollar apiece. Submarines meant little to the boys on the boat after the first day. Submarines lurking under the water furnished little excitement. The English and American soldiers argued about the merits of their respective homelands. One Britisher thought Americans couldn't fight, but a big Montana cowboy gave him a definite evidence to the contrary. Many men slept on the wet, cold decks to escape the hot, ill-smelling holds and some dodged detail as much as possible; one private passing as a Captain's orderly to escape K. P. duty. Many of the men remained up on the night of July 16th for a first glimpse of land and swore that trench life would have nothing on 14 days below the water line with Chinaman cooks and English rations. Their reward came about midnight when the hardly visible shore lights of the Irish coast brought forth a volley of shouts and joyful gestures. Dawn was wonderful, showing distinctly the coasts of Scotland and Ireland. About noon of July 17th, part of the convoy continued down through the Irish sea to the Mersey river, and on to the Liverpool docks.

The first thing that greeted our eyes out of the gray horizon of Liverpool was an immense advertisement, "Spratt's Dog Cakes." Portentous, the men agreed; if they hadn't already eaten many a dog biscuit on the way over, they were due for some. And there, just as the Empress warped into dock, a vivid touch of home: a real-live Ford touring car bowling down the wharf, greeted by a roar of eager approval by the restless Yanks.

The ships lay in the stream that night, with excursion boats crowded with frantically cheering sightseers from New Brighton Beach—the first welcome from Europe. The next day the regiment marched through Liverpool through narrow lanes of welcoming English, mostly children, women and old men, with more youngsters trotting alongside than the Pied Piper lured away, their shrill voices piping out, "The Yanks are coming," while the older people waved their handkerchiefs or gave their "God bless you" with moist eyes. The shadow of the war hung over the land.

CHAPTER III

REST CAMPS

WHILE at the Liverpool docks, more than a hundred men, women, and children were landed from a small steamer. Their disheveled hair, lack of clothing, and haggard faces told the story of mental and physical suffering. They had boarded an ocean liner the day before with every hope of a safe voyage to America, but a German submarine interfered with their plans and their ship had gone to the bottom of the sea carrying with it many victims. The rest had escaped in lifeboats and had been picked up by a passing steamer. As they passed along the dock the boys lined the railing and cheered them to the echo.

Join the Army and See the World
—On Foot

tents were conical in shape, supposed to hold about eight men, but in most cases twenty were crowded into one. Each man was given a pad a couple of inches thick to use as a mattress. It was narrow at one end and wide at the other so the boys had to sleep with their feet towards the center pole of the tent. Each man had two blankets, but these hardly sufficed to keep away the damp chill as the gloomy English sky opened its windows and let the rain come through in torrents. Little urchins followed the soldiers, calling out, "Hey! Yank; 'ave you got any cents (sense)."

The rations were issued by the British army, and were a little more palatable than those on board ship. Two nights in this camp was long enough to stamp unpleasant impressions on the memories of all and after another cobblestone hike (it seemed the Rest Camp was built as far away from the entraining point as possible) the regiment divided by companies into groups, boarded English trains, eight men in a coupe, and traveled sixty miles an hour through the beautiful landscapes of central England, passing Oxford and the old University and the famous Shakespeare country at Stratford-on-Avon.

At Southampton the march to another Rest Camp on the commons, which proved even worse than the first—rain, mud, jam, tea, and stew were served for supper, and that night and early morning were devoted to foot repairs while the regiment retraced their march back to the docks and boarded transports soon to be bound for "Somewhere in France." The convoy slipped down the river before sunset, and steamed out into the channel after nightfall. It was a dark night, unusually cold, and the men grouped on the crowded deck for there were no sleeping quarters. The many partly destroyed ships, lying along the channel banks, only added to speculations which somewhat lessened the uncomfortableness and cold. It was with bleary eyes and heaving stomachs that the men looked out on rainy France the next morning, and disembarked amid strange scenes. The regiment marched through the city of La Havre, climbing a long, winding hill to Rest Camp Number four. Passing through the city, the men saw for the first time many French and Belgian soldiers, and women and children wearing wooden shoes, pushing and pulling small carts assisted by dogs. The streets were narrow and crooked, but not as dirty as Liverpool. Half-open, foul-smelling latrines were to be seen at different places—a French custom so different from those in America. Women followed the marching columns of men offering shriveled oranges and horrible chocolate for sale at fabulous prices. French gamines ran along calling out “Souvenir America.” “Ah, Monsieur, donnez moi un souvenir.” The column was halted and the “maire” (mayor) came to the C. O. and delivered a short speech. A little French girl presented a bunch of flowers. This was our welcome to France.

The regiment remained in this camp over-night and the men were given a bath in their own perspiration, which, together with two rifa meals, put them in good spirits again. They had the pleasure during the afternoon of seeing a number of German prisoners at work. That night as the men lay on the ground in their tents the distant roar of the big guns could be heard at the front, causing the imaginations to be stimulated and a thrill of anticipation.

An officer of the regiment walked through a glass window on the second floor after a perfect day in which he consumed many drinks, some of which looked like benzine and tasted like——??

“Halt! Who goes there?”

“Officer of the camp.”

“Advance, Officer, and be recognized.”

“Report, Officer, to the corporal of the guard to be recognized.”

“But, what the h——! I’m in command in this camp.”

“Come, Officer; you’re drunk.”

CHAPTER IV

THE WRECK

THE first train to leave La Havre carrying 362nd men left about three o'clock on the afternoon of July 25th. Little, toy-looking cars, with dinky, little engines, compared to the iron monsters of America, make up the French train. "Hommes 40—Chevaux 8" is forever engraved upon the memory of the returning soldiers, Men 40—Horses 8 of the French box cars.

It was in these, American soldiers were transported, forty men where room was found for eight horses, a ratio of one to five, which appealed to the American sense of humor. If lucky, the men had straw on the floor. If not, they padded their hips as well as possible.

Somehow every one managed to sprawl or sit, taking turns at sleeping when much room was needed, or jamming around the side door to see the country and try to guess their destination.

Someone told Lieutenant Severs of the great dangers from aeroplanes. They induced him to wear a steel helmet and tramp up and down the corridor on guard duty. This joke caused much concealed merriment. But true to life the comedy was turned into tragedy. While the train was standing on the main line near the station in the village of Bonnières a short time before midnight there came a terrible crash. A heavy loaded, fast moving train had plowed into the rear end of our troop train, piling many of the cars one on top of another, and breaking some of them into kindling wood.

On each side of the track, as far as sixty feet, lay the wreck of the box cars, the dead and dying in grotesque positions. As the engine plowed through the last seven cars, it scrambled trucks, wood, iron, bodies and rifles in a tangled mass. Feet and arms peeped forth from the wreckage. Blood and brains and dismembered legs and arms were spattered and scattered everywhere. One body rested under the rear wheels of the engines.

The noise brought from the village some old peasants, who in turn called doctors and nurses from a French hospital nearby.

Sufficient men were called from the other cars to rescue the wounded. They were dug from the debris with care and placed side by side along the country road. There, by a flickering lantern, the village Cure' administered last rites while Red Cross nurses from the hospital busied themselves with those in whom the light of life burned stronger.

It was there the regiment first came to know the wonder of the American soldier. Thirty-two men were killed outright or died later, and sixty-three were maimed and mangled in that wreck.

The only noise was that of the rescue parties, save when the pain of moving brought forth an involuntary groan. With crushed chests, smashed heads, arms and legs broken or cut off, these men lay without a murmur. Men pinned down by the weight of tons on their legs or arms begged the rescue parties to work first upon some of their comrades nearby.

The dying lay patiently, giving the final words of their life to be written to their mothers, their wives or their sweethearts, or receiving the last rites from the Cure'. One poor fellow, with a leg gone and badly crushed, managed to whisper to his comrades round about him as he lay writhing in his death struggles, "Give them hell for me, boys!" and passed away.

It is of such stuff that American soldiers are made.

Those poor fellows, traveling across the ocean to fight for their country, had their lives crushed out in a miserable train wreck, with never the chance to hear a shot fired. But they died bravely, and are as much heroes as those who gave their lives on the battlefield.

But war is war. And at half-past three the remainder of the train moved on, leaving the wounded in care of two of the regimental doctors, with ambulances from a nearby town taking them to a hospital there.

It was a sad regiment, sorrowed by the utter uselessness, the needless loss.

Investigation afterward showed that a French engineer of the other train came whizzing down the track at sixty miles an hour, probably with his thoughts on "gay Paree," for he ran through danger lights and failed to see the frantic signaling of the brakeman.

Three officers and twenty-one men remained to care for the wounded and bury the dead. The funeral was held three days later, the coffins being furnished by a nearby French morgue. The name, company, regiment and date of death was inscribed on a metal plate and fastened on the coffin lid, then the twenty-nine coffins were placed before a building in a spot formed by the Y-shaped streets. The gorgeous flowers that bedecked our dead comrades were the expressions of sympathy from French people in and near the village. Following a short service, French army wagons conveyed them to the little village cemetery, with the pallbearers marching behind each wagon and two French soldiers in full equipment marching one each side of the wagons, and four soldiers carrying flowers belonging with each coffin. A Belgian military band played an appropriate funeral march.

It was estimated that five thousand people paid respect, by their presence, to the American dead. Short speeches were made by a French general, a state official, a railroad representative, and a priest. They paid great tribute to the American soldiers and the aid the American people were giving, after which prayer was offered and the military salute for the dead given. Each soldier was buried in a separate grave. Certain families in the town adopted the graves and agreed to care for them. Since that time a small monument has been erected in the village in memory of the American soldiers who met an untimely death while on their way to the battle line of the western front.

CHAPTER V

OUR FIRST TRAINING AREA IN FRANCE

THE regiment was billeted in five small villages, with the First Battalion Headquarters, Machine Gun, and Supply Companies assigned to Dammartin, L and M companies to Avrecourt, and I and K companies in Recourt. The companies of the Second Battalion were assigned to the villages of Bonnacourt and Freecourt, just over the ridge from Recourt.

For six weeks the 91st Division trained around Montigny Le Roi, in Haute Marne, a rolling grazing country, with narrow ridges and miles of terrain suitable for maneuvers. Towns were small and frequent, and used more for cows than people, for cows were stabled in the same building, the manure piled outside the door. The bigger the pile the larger the number of cows; so one could measure the wealth of each house by the manure outside.

Castles in France

Bath tubs there were none; movie pictures none. The houses were centuries old, dirt and bricks, with few windows, and water obtainable principally at the town pump, which generally was close by the community wash-house, where the women beat and rubbed their washing on stones that showed the wear of generations.

The soldiers were quartered in temporary barracks or in stable lofts with ticks of straw for beds, fairly comfortable in the pleasant weather of August. Drilling was long and steady, plentifully interspersed with maneuvers and terrain exercises. The evenings went in gossip of war and talk of the fighting and the ever-present guessing in what part of the line the regiment would go for its baptism of fire. Occasionally we came in touch with the fighting world in the return to the villages of French soldiers on "permission."

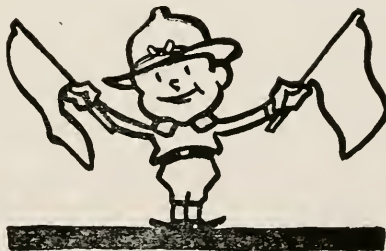

On some days long lines of French trucks, hours in passing, bumped their way through the villages, drivers coated in face, eye-lashes and hair with white dust, with tired eyes holding the road, on their way to the "front." Occasionally dispatch riders came whizzing through, a noisy honking, the glimpse of a crouched figure and then a blur in the distance.

On the railroad daily passed Red Cross trains filled with wounded, the "sitting" cases leaning out of the windows to yell snatches of information at those still to enter the fray.

The Front!

The unknown; the goal of a year's training; the burrows in the earth where Death swept the scythe in grim carelessness of numbers.

Eagerly every bit of information concerning it was gathered, gossiped about in barracks, enlarged, and finally contradicted by the latest comer.

Necessary in Practice Only

For six weeks the division drilled and maneuvered. In the first days of September, it was out on a three days' maneuver, generally believed to be the last before departure to a quiet sector for easy stages into sectors of heavier fighting.

Letters had been written, wristlets and mufflers and other paraphernalia discarded and final baths taken in the showers the companies had constructed.

The three-day maneuvers were never finished. On the second day couriers brought the rush message to return to billets immediately and prepare for a march.

The day had come!

The "Front" had called the 91st!

A private was court-martialed at Dammartin for drinking a whole barrel of a lady's wine through a hose with which he provided himself for the purpose.

A sergeant of the 362nd wrote to his fiancée in Los Angeles, his "best girl" at Tacoma, his "only beloved" at Olympia, and the "only girl he truly loved" at Seattle. The censor inadvertently got the letters mixed up. What happened as a result was never divulged by the sergeant.

One young man wrote a cheerful letter home. "I am learning the French language fast. I can say twice as much as I could when I arrived here. When I arrived I could say 'Oui' and now I can say 'Oui, oui.'"

Another wrote: "Mother, I'm where the bullets are thickest—I'm unloading ammunition."

Two men got cold one night and they chopped down a tree out of a lady's orchard. The lady complained to Colonel Parker and the two men were put on the carpet.

"Didn't you know better than to do that?"

"Yes, Sir."

"I've a damn good notion to have you shot."

"Very well, Sir."

Officer, to a man who was walking behind a hedge so that he could not be observed by the enemy: "Stand up and walk like a man." The man straightened. Two seconds later the officer and the man were fighting for the same hole.

CHAPTER VI

MOVING UP TO THE FRONT

OFFICERS and soldiers made their packs, donating to French friends the mufflers, the wristlets, the collar boxes and all the gee-gaws that loving relatives and friends had pictured as necessities in the front line. A soldier carries all his belongings on his back. Leaving the Montigny area, they were loaded down: an extra pair of shoes, overcoat, blankets, underclothes, shelter-half, etc., totaling from fifty to sixty pounds, fairly light at the start of the day, but back-breaking toward the end of the tenth kilometer, and by the twentieth only cuss words covered the case.

Without much fuss, the division moved out of the area. The 362nd Regiment made a twenty-four kilometer march from Dammartin to Chauffort, the hot day and the heavy hills dropping many by the wayside, only to find on arrival at Chauffort that some field clerk at corps or division headquarters had made a mistake, and that Chalindrey, and not Chauffort, was where the regiment should have marched. Chalindrey being the same distance from Dammartin as Chauffort, in an entirely different direction, it was a small matter—for the field clerk. The next day—September 9th—shone fair and bright, as French days deceptively will. Chalindrey, twenty-eight kilometers away, but not four kilometers were behind the regiment before the rain came down in torrents, drenching everybody and everything.

Airplane Service—Fine in training area

The army raincoat is cut to ideal specifications for a 12-year-old. Above that age the coat hangs above the knees, every step exposing the knee, and all the leg, to the water. Packs are heavy in themselves, but when wet are twice as heavy. But the men took it gamely, whistling or singing or swearing or shouting to soldiers billeted along the way. At Chalindrey the 361st Regiment was already encamped by the station waiting for the train. The 362nd went under canvas, in pup tents. Fires here and there marking in shadowy outline the long, straight lines of tents and the figures of the smoking men looked much like the pictures of the Civil War battlefields.

The next day the regiment entrained in the usual box cars of "Hommes 40—Chevaux 8," luckily with straw. The Machine Gun company placed several machine guns and gun squads on flat cars of the train as protection against Boche aeroplanes, for the German had the annoying trick of bombing trains, with a result described by an English officer as "rawther messy."

A day and a night travel, slow and jerky, passing innumerable troops and Red Cross trains of wounded, ended about midnight, and men and baggage dumped out at a siding in the fitful glare of truck headlights. From there a five kilometer march stretched down the dark to the designated town.

After fussing around, and slowly picking its way through a small town, the regiment reached the outskirts of Houdlaincourt, the leading elements waking out of their walking drowse at the full-toned voice of an American woman, singing out, "Send them in here."

It was the first contact with the Salvation Army. Truth to tell, the regiment never ran across another hut in its wanderings, until long after the armistice, when awaiting ship at St. Nazaire, for the Salvation Army did not have the numbers nor facilities for extensive work.

Several days the regiment lay around Houdlaincourt, why, no one exactly knew. The canal running through the place proved to be a good swimming hole during the Sunday rest day spent here. A few of the men took the opportunity offered and did some much-needed family washing. Rumors were afloat that a big attack was planned in the next few days; that the regiment was being held in reserve and might be called.

In the meantime the utmost care was taken that the presence of soldiers in the town might not be known. The front lines were not far away and Boche airplanes broke through the Allied cordon fairly often for reconnaissance of the back area.

On the second night, hurried orders sent the 362nd Regiment and the other regiments from their nearby towns marching toward the front. Some twenty kilometers were reeled off that night, in the inky blackness of the night, 3,200 men plodding along under full pack, bound somewhere, for something, others higher than themselves alone knew.

Before dawn the regiment arrived at some woods, where guides for each company had been sent in advance to mark the location of each company. The tired men flopped where they found themselves, save details ordered to help the wagons up the steep slopes of the hillsides and under cover of the trees, away from the watchful eyes of the Boche planes. Daytime passed in sleep, or the few winks that were had in the midst of restless stirring.

That afternoon another sudden move was made of only a few kilometers across the hills, under the cover of the forest, to the slopes of Lanueville. And it was there it became known that the 91st Division was part of the American forces to straighten out the St.-Mihiel salient.

And it was at Lanueville also that the regiment first came in touch with war. The big guns were heard booming in the distance, a dull, heavy, muffled roar that rose and died in intensity like wind through the trees. Off there at the front those shells were killing and maiming men with their dreadful bursts, but the regiment lay in safe distance with only noise to tell of the nearness of the conflict. An hour before dusk that night one of the many airplanes seen as dots circling in the sky over the distant front, shook itself free from its many companions and headed straight over the German line. Shortly, white puffs and black puffs appeared in the blue around it, the burst of the anti-aircraft guns of the Germans seeking the fall of the pilot. But as if luck were at the steering gear, the aeroplane wove its way in and out of the puffs that dotted the sky on all sides of the machine, flying apparently straight down the German lines, the puffs marking its wake as sea-gulls the passage of a ship.

Several Boche planes rose after the intruder, swooping and diving and flopping about, but the Allied plane held to its general course, finally making its way back over its own lines, the pursuers turning homeward at the last instant of safety. The regiment eyed it all open-mouthed—a diversion that compelled the men to disregard "orders" to keep "under cover."

CHAPTER VII

ST.-MIHIEL—SEPTEMBER 11TH-13TH

THE artillery barrage started at one o'clock on the morning of September 12th. The flash of the guns could be vividly seen and their heavy roar kept the men awake. During the day many squadrons of aeroplanes passed overhead; more than a hundred were counted in one squadron. These planes kept going and coming from the front lines all day. The men kept under cover of the wet, dripping woods like hunted rabbits. The regiment was in reserve.

Three German officers committed suicide on the night before the withdrawal from St.-Mihiel. The families with whom they were quartered discovered the bodies in the morning. The German colonel commanding the troops in the town wanted the families taken to Germany for an investigation, but the town major refused and later discovered letters that the suicides had written to their families, saying that they were discouraged and disheartened with the course of the war since the Americans entered the conflict in force and preferred death to defeat.

The hundred men between the ages of 18 and 45 who were seized and started back to work in ammunition factories in Germany never reached Vigneulles. They and their guards ran straight into an American patrol, who captured the Germans and released the French, who went back immediately to St.-Mihiel to assure their relatives of their safety.

The American success at St.-Mihiel was complete; but few casualties occurred, while 150 square miles of territory was captured together with 30,000 prisoners. The entire American losses were 300 dead and 1,200 wounded.

The regiment marched to the Sorcy-Commercy road on the evening of September 13th and loaded into French trucks. These trucks rumbled and bumped along the hard road all night. Not a light outside of distant star shells was anywhere to be seen. There were fifteen hundred trucks used that night in transporting the 91st Division. How the drivers ever felt their way through the darkness without accident is a miracle in the minds of those who rode inside the covered camions. The regiment unloaded in the shell-torn town of Remembercourt. Remembercourt had been badly shelled in 1914 by the Germans, who had swept that far with little resistance, being turned back from a general line running through the little town in the gallant counter-attacks that the French made. The old church was badly damaged, for, as usual, the Germans had made that an object of special artillery fire. Houses were ruined, tumbled down like a ruthless hand knocks down a house of cards. Houses still standing had gaping holes, where smaller shells pierced the walls. The hills roundabout were dotted with graves, where both French and Germans fell in the heavy fighting of 1914. Some of the companies remained in the ruins of the town during the day. Others camped in a woods near the town while some of the Third Battalion proceeded five kilometers to the village of Sommaisne. Colonel Parker joined the 362nd here to replace Colonel Whitworth, who had been promoted to brigadier general.

There is not a man alive who was in the regiment on the night of September 16th that will ever forget the march to Jubrecourt. Hundreds of exhausted men arrived in the village at different times during the following day because they were unable to keep up with the regiment during the night. Many soldiers threw away pieces of their clothing and some even parted with their blankets that they might endure the march. Jubrecourt was badly wrecked. It had endured more than four years of war. The houses where the men were billeted were shell-torn and crumbling. We were coming into a new fighting area.

"They were lying dug in on the hills
East of the Argonne, France.
Some were forever still,
But the rest were taking their chance.

"Four days they had battled the Boche,
These boys from over the sea,
Fighting as only Americans can,
For the cause of Liberty.

"Gesnes was just over the hill,
And full of the dirty Hun,
The kind that holler Kamerad
While working machine guns.

"The order came to advance;
Capture the town we must,
And the Colonel said we'd do it, too,
We'd do it by God or bust.

"Shells and shrapnel and bullets and gas—
But only the hit went down.
Forward in thinning lines they went,
To the ridge beyond the town.

"This isn't the song of the light brigade,
But another he-man fight,
And I guess the ravine this side of Gesnes
Was the valley of death, all right!

"Powder River, hook 'em cow!
This was their war-cry yell,
And it means we'll never stop this side
Of the fiery brink of Hell."

CHAPTER VIII

FROM ST.-MIHIEL TO ARGONNE

THE regiment left Jubrecourt and vicinity on the night of September 17th and marched a short distance to Parois. This place was only two or three miles from the front lines, and was not occupied by a single civilian. The advance party had much trouble finding billets for the various companies.

Along the Road

some of the companies were eating breakfast in the Parois woods, heavy shells came whistling overhead and struck a few hundred yards in the rear. The Germans were trying to blow up an ammunition dump, and the whir-r-r of the H. E. sent cold chills up and down many spines, but in spite of this the men had a big laugh, as each shell went over and exploded safely in the rear.

That night the regiment moved a short distance forward into the Foret De Hesse. As the men moved forward under cover of darkness they were almost afraid to whisper for fear the Germans would hear them. The tension was somewhat lessened after the troops had passed a "Frog" driving a four-horse outfit and yelling at the top of his voice, "Allez!! Allez!!" Guides led the columns single file through the woods and over trenches and through barbed-wire entanglements. It was enough to try the courage of a Putnam and the patience of a Job. Regimental headquarters was established in a dugout at a place called Rendezvous-de-Chasse a short distance back of the front line trenches. The various companies pitched their pup tents in the woods and underbrush. Mud was knee-deep in places. At times different companies were moving forward to hold advance positions as they were taken over from the French. In a few days men became very indifferent to anything German. Company D lined up for mess a German plane flew overhead and dropped bombs. Not a man moved out of line. Rather die than lose his place in

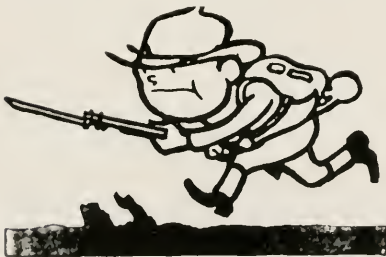

When the companies did arrive, it was hard to locate the places that had been assigned to them. Negro soldiers had stayed in the billets the night before the 362nd arrived. The regiment remained in Parois until after nightfall of the 18th and then moved forward a short distance to the southern edge of the Parois woods. The night before the regiment reached there, the Germans had shelled the cross-roads. Every other night or so the guns dropped a shell or two around it. None came the night the 362nd Regiment was there. Several did the next night, when the 361st, which was following us, spent the night there.

The next evening the regiment moved a kilometer and a half into Parois Woods, some three kilometers behind the front lines, awaiting orders to go into the line.

On the morning of the 19th, while the mess line. The ground was part of the old Verdun battlefield. It was hard to find a spot which had not been hit by a shell. Gas alarms were popular during the night, and often the alarm would be carried for more than a mile along the line. This forced some men to try and sleep in their masks, but they found it very uncomfortable. The rain fell in torrents at times, increasing the difficulties until it made the muddy ground and woods almost unbearable, for the soldiers were sleeping in pup tents. A narrow-gauge railroad ended near regimental headquarters upon which supplies were brought up on small cars at night. The dump was covered with camouflage. Big guns by the hundreds were pulled and slipped about in the woods during the nights and sometimes days preceding the drive. Big caterpillar tractors snorted and sniffed as they slushed through the clayey mud or got stalled while pushing a Howitzer into place making ready for the greatest of all drives. Heinies flew overhead during the daytime, but anti-aircraft guns were continually shooting at the German planes, keeping them high enough so as to prevent photographs. The bursting shells made black and white puffs of smoke in the sky and one could easily trace the wake of the Hun as he maneuvered out of danger. One or two men in the regiment were hurt by falling shrapnel. A number of officers and men who had been attending school at Langres rejoined the regiment here and officers and non-coms went into the front line trenches and looked over the ground in no-mans-land. They always wore the French jacket and cap while on these tours to keep the enemy from becoming alarmed at the sight of strange opponents. But either the unusual noise or observations of German pilots made the Boche fearful that something unusual was going on, for, during several nights before the American attack, he sent over raiding parties in an effort to capture prisoners. They came over with a box barrage that hemmed in the French outposts on both sides and the rear with bursting shells, so they could not withdraw before the Germans arrived. The French lost a man or two, but in hand-to-hand fighting in the trenches they accounted for many more of the Boche.

The Germans were exceedingly nervous, however, for the second night before the planned attack they sent over a raiding party of 200 against the sector on our right, behind which lay the 37th Division ready to take over from the French. A good many Germans were killed or made prisoners and from these it was found that the raiding party consisted of special shock troops that went from sector to sector, making raids or any other specially rough work desired, in between times enjoying extra furloughs and special privileges. The nights were a little tense with excitement, for the woods were a hurly-burly of noise and occasionally the Germans dropped over gas shells.

The Way the Boys Felt

In training camps in this country the troops, on detecting gas in the air, had been taught to yell "Gas! Gas!" Several gas shells did break in our regimental area with no damage, for those nearby adjusted their masks in plenty of time. But the cry of "Gas" once started, was relayed on and on, possibly never stopping until it reached the ears of more seasoned troops. Certain it is that the sleep we had was broken many times the first few nights by cries of "Gas" from thousands of throats, the origin and location of the danger probably being miles away. But the men soon tired of that and by the third night no one was yelling "Gas" unless he actually got a little whiff of the noxious vapors. Much has been written of the preparedness and lack of preparedness and of equipment of the troops going into action. Our regiment on the eve of action was well prepared as far as training. In equipment, the regiment was woefully short. The much-vaunted Browning automatic rifle was never seen by our regiment. Instead they were given old Chauchats of the French army, many of which had to be junked as absolutely useless, and as there are sixteen automatic rifles per company—an important weapon in defense and useful in offense—the loss was serious. After the Argonne battle was over, many men who had Chauchat rifles clog and become absolutely useless, but who had shouldered a rifle and went into the fray with a determined madness to get even, were rewarded with court-martial sentences and fines amounting to 500 francs. The money was held out of payrolls—army regulations.

The regiment was lacking in rifle grenades—important weapons of offense against machine gun nests. Worse still, the regiment did not have a single Stokes mortar, the deadly enemy of Boche machine gun nests. One officer, three sergeants, several corporals and some forty men had been trained a year in the use of these mortars, of which six were supposed to be with each regiment, but never, either in the Argonne or later in Belgium, did the regiment have a single one.

In signal apparatus, in heliographs, telephones, wireless, rockets and flares the stock was insufficient. The Pioneer Platoon, a unit supposed to demolish obstacles, build bridges and do the work of engineers on a small scale, was without tools save little combat shovels.

In transportation a serious handicap was had. The 206 or so horses necessary by table for the work of a regiment, in actual practice was some ninety-six, skin-and-bone affairs, turned over by the French, that could barely pull themselves.

Rolling kitchens were insufficient in number, which, combined with the scarcity of horses, meant lack of hot food when something warming and filling was needed for the body-killing work of the infantry.

Compasses, so necessary in confusing country of the Argonne, were short. Pistols for shooting flares and artillery signals, were below the necessary amount. Many of the little necessities, like flash-lights, range finders, etc., that make the difference between good work and slipshod work, were lacking.

The regiment, however, had plenty of rifles, bayonets and ammunition. In addition, it had an excellent machine gun company, plentifully supplied with ammunition and a good machine gun battalion that operated in connection with our regiment and the other regiment of the same brigade. Luckily, also, the regiment had its one-pounder guns, that played havoc with the machine gun nests. So it was not without arms on entering the conflict.

The division was sadly lacking in transportation. There were not enough trucks for the work and the lack of ambulances later caused needless loss of many lives.

Then and later, there was considerable bitterness over the sending into conflict an outfit without the necessary tools.

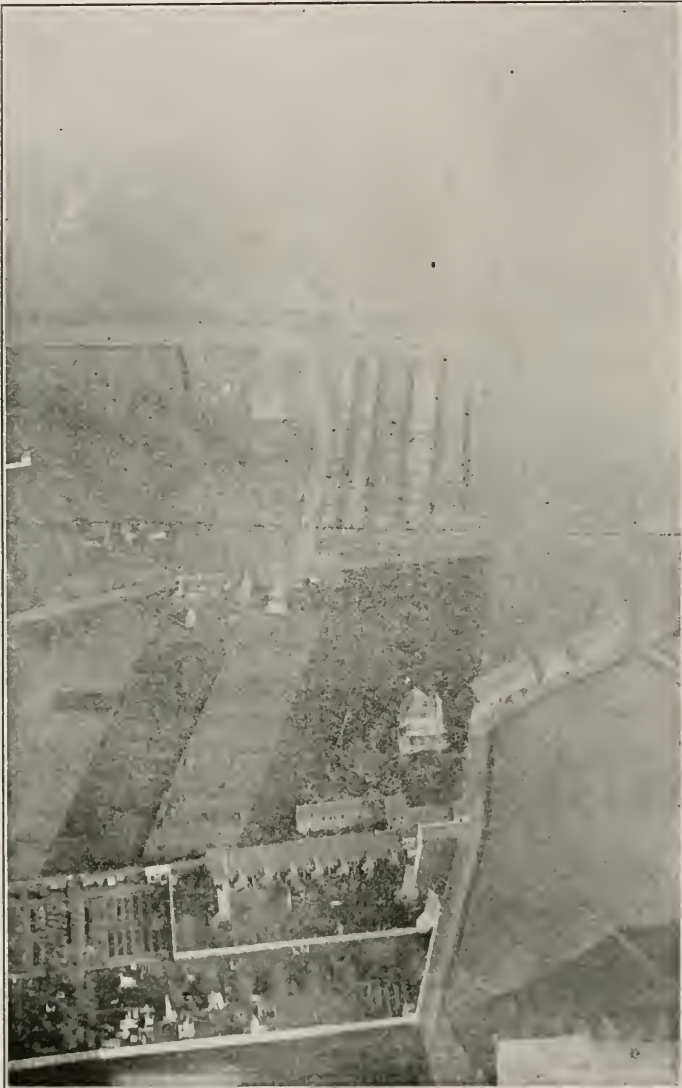

The joke went around the men that they were expected to bite the Germans with their teeth. But later, after the armistice, when a little peep into the why and wherefore of this and that was allowed the combat regiments through the medium of lectures by high officers from army headquarters, reasons were given that made it understandable why our regiment was hurried into hasty fighting in its poorly equipped shape.

Going Over the Top—The bayonet was their best friend

But whatever the equipment, the morale of the men was high on their eve of battle. The men were calm, cool and eager. Nothing could have held them from the fray. Men used every trick they could to escape being sent to the hospital for minor injuries or sickness.

CHAPTER IX

OVER THE TOP IN THE ARGONNE

LATE in the afternoon of September 25th detailed orders arrived calling for the attack the next morning—the last objective was set some twenty-eight kilometers away. That meant the penetration of the entire German system of trenches and defensive works that had resisted for four years all efforts of the French. It meant giving the Germans the tremendous advantage that came from being on the defensive in the rugged, hilly, forested Argonne country. All four regiments of the 91st were on the line, in the following order from left to right: 364th, 363d, 361st and 362nd, with the 37th Division on the right of the 362nd Regiment and the 35th Division on the left of the 364th. The companies received orders to make up light packs with slickers and to leave the rest of the equipment on dump. The men were told what was to take place. They were to go into the front line trenches and go “over the top” at 5:30 in the morning. Only those who have gone through such an ordeal know the thoughts and feelings experienced by the soldiers when they realized that the great hour toward which they had been looking for months had arrived. At such a time it lost all its charm and glory. War loomed up in all of its hellishness and frightfulness.

That evening before the attack, or rather the early part of the evening, was a quiet, thoughtful period, in which many of the men wrote letters or talked in low tones of the little services after death that friends promise one another.

And as the highest periods of exaltation have accompanying sides of ridiculousness, Colonel John Henry Parker, commanding the regiment, received a peremptory letter from some quartermaster in the United States, along with numerous attached letters, to remit immediately 56 cents for a curry comb his numberly had lost at Fort Riley three years before.

The companies moved into the front line for the most part during the hours before midnight. Some of them met the yelling, swearing French soldiers as they bumped into American soldiers in their mad rush for the rear to escape the iron storm about to burst. No pen can describe the grandeur and magnitude of this mighty bombardment. It filled the soul with awe. Men forgot to be afraid as they reveled in its power. With a couple of distinguishable explosions, the American artillery began, rising in half a minute to an inferno of noise, in which separate explosions merged into one continuous sound. The air roared, the ground shook, the trees were swaying. Those shells whistled, sang, bellowed, screeched and, reaching their target, exploded with heavy muffled bursts as they hit German trenches and dugouts.

Thousands of guns were adding their voice and their shells to the merry reception for Fritz. With designated targets, they played all over the German positions, each battery with a definite object of smothering this trench or reducing that strong point. And they kept it up—a din and a roar that seemed to split the ears and dam up the brain. Talk was possible by putting the mouth against an ear and shouting. Forty winks of sleep were impossible. There was nothing to do but sit and listen to those shells and wish and wish and wish, with the strongest wishing in you, that every one of the shells, big and little, meant the less Germans on the advance.

The Germans soon talked back, with both their heavies and their smaller guns, but nowhere near so strongly as our guns, both for their lack of numbers and for fear their flashes would bring down instant annihilation. But their shrapnel went cracking through the trees and their shells burst in the forest as the Germans played for the crossroads and the well-known points.

Our regiment by that time was in a fairly safe place, packed in on the reverse slope of a steep little hill on the top of which was the French wire. Only high-angled fire could have reached there, and none seemed to be used. The shells of flat trajectory sang over the top of the hill and burst in the little ravine, rising like a flowering pot of fireworks. In the little dugouts the French had driven into the side of the hill, or on the ledge connecting these and the different levels, officers and men waited, tightening their light packs, oiling their guns or polishing their bayonets that glittered feebly in the pale light.

After several hours our artillery died down slightly. Between the heavier salvos, men talked or puffed cigarettes in the dugouts, the heavy smoke-filled holes pierced with little glows of fire. The hungry—and the soldier is ever hungry—opened up bully beef for a light breakfast. A few wrote letters for the Chaplain to mail. No one was sad. There was an undercurrent of gayety, a little nervous, it is true, but nevertheless bubbling over with rather grisly pictures of what would be done to the Germans.

The shells whistled back and forth overhead, bound to the German trenches or to our rear. There is no other thing in the world loved or hated with such intensity, according to the direction of its travel, as a shell. A shell of ours singing overhead bound for the Boche is music to the ears. A German shell bound toward you has an ominous sound, as the joke used to be, "slightly disturbing."

About half-past three or four heavy explosions came from the German lines and the sky was lit up with huge flames that spread like enormous fans in the air. From a vantage point on the hill in the French wire the explosions seemed to be the blowing up of ammunition dumps which the Germans feared would be overrun in the first fierce rush of the drive.

The hours slowly passed, for at such waitings time has leaden feet. The low-toned talk was mostly of the Germans and what would happen to them; a refresher of the best methods of bayonetting; the latest tactics against machine gun, and the all-absorbing topic of how each individual would feel under shell-fire. Of course, the talk drifted to home; to hopes of an early end of the war—mighty slim at that particular time; to training camp at Lewis; and then back again to war, to the effects of mustard gas, of which lecturers had spread a healthy fear.

Around five o'clock the fire of preparation slowed down, and shortly after a heavy barrage was laid down on the enemy's first line trenches. Until the hour of attack, the artillery played with might and main on that target. Six-inch Stokes mortars threw enormous bombs of TNT on several block-houses whose positions were known, and shortly before the attack was due switched to smoke bombs to screen the American advance from the machine-gunners and snipers.

About five-thirty o'clock orders were given to fix bayonets. From then on until five-fifty-five the men waited quietly, their bayonets gleaming faintly, for the word to go over the top for the first time.

Sharp at five-fifty-five the order was given for the advance. Without a word of noise, platoons, with their lieutenants or sergeants at the head, ran up the steep slope. Ahead of them worked squads of wire cutters to clear wide paths for the advance.

Clearing the top and crossing No-Mans-Land, not a shot came from the German side. All seemed deserted. The terrific shelling of the American guns had not left an unchurned yard of dirt. The shells and TNT bombs had laid the German wire flat in most places.

The listening posts of the Germans and their firing trenches were battered in. The blockhouses, which housed machine guns, were ruined masses of concrete. Little remained of the trenches save the freshly turned earth, gaping with large holes, that was plowed up for hundreds of yards.

Passing the front line trenches, not a shot came from the Germans. The advance began to be a joke with the men. They waved to each other, cracked jokes, and probably thought themselves on the high road to Berlin with nothing to impede their progress.

The trail of the Germans shortly entered the woods. Here dugouts were laid bare, for the French had the German trenches well mapped from aeroplane pictures and reports of raiding parties. All of them showed signs of hurried desertion.

But it was only after an hour and a half of slow advance through the woods that actual contact with the Germans was had. They opened up suddenly on our right with machine gun fire, killing Lee Gautsche of Company I and wounding Captain Charles Thorp and several men of his company. Lee was the first man killed in the regiment, in actual combat. But that nest was soon cleaned out, several Germans killed and several taken prisoners, and the regiment swept on. But the progress was marked by steady though not heavy fighting. Little groups of American soldiers worked to the flanks of machine gun nests and bayoneted the Germans, or sent them onward with grenades, their handiwork remaining in the little heaps of bleeding bodies.

Snipers were plentiful, causing much trouble, for they were hard to locate and their damage was great. But the regiment managed to ferret them out, mopping up Very Woods and Chehemin Woods with considerable damage to the Germans, many prisoners and comparatively little loss to our side.

The German prisoners were a tractable lot, many of them exceedingly afraid they would be killed and not ashamed to beg for their lives. Several Prussian officers were among them, rather lordly fellows, but nearly all of them, officers and men, expressed themselves as glad their part of the war was over. One prisoner was an Alsatian who had been forced to fight against his beloved France.

Leaving Chehemin Woods, the German artillery began to play over the area. The shells were bursting with frequency and considerable damage, some of them hitting German prisoners as well as our own men. The men were like seasoned warriors, never hesitating in their advance, though their comrades on right and left might be hit by machine-gun bullets or mangled to pieces by shells. The less said about the effect of artillery shells on the human body the better. One minute there may be two or three specimens of perfect manhood, the next minute nothing but raw carcasses or groaning wounded with stumps for arms or legs. The Germans were paying some toll though, for the men got considerable of their number in machine gun nests and in snipers up trees. The artillery shelling before the advance also had caught a considerable number, and the ground was fairly well dotted with the German dead in their gray field uniform. German infantry in number was not seen. They were fighting with artillery, machine guns and snipers. The machine-gunners remained at their posts firing like fiends, never quitting until practically surrounded, when the familiar "Kamerad" was used to save them. Sometimes it did and sometimes it didn't.

Rushing its way relentlessly, the regiment forged slowly ahead, fighting all day, crumbling in one defense after the other, brushing aside machine gun nests, uncovering snipers, for all of which it paid a considerable toll in dead and wounded. Late afternoon found the regiment facing Epinonville across a small valley, over which sang the machine gun rattle from the nests hidden in the woods. The First Battalion, then leading the advance, was hung up for a while in trenches on the forward slope, our one-pounders and machine guns blazing away to silence the opposition. Gradually they were silenced considerably and enough men were filtered across slowly to cover the passage of the rest of the battalion. Night came down and the regiment settled for its first night in the open. A shell hole with a shelter half was the best lodging obtainable, save for the fortunate few who found an occasional deserted dugout. The First Battalion organized Epinonville for defense and pushed their lines beyond it. In dugouts there they found luxurious quarters, but recently and hurriedly deserted, shown by the half-filled beer glasses, the field glasses and a magnificent fur coat. In the early evening the battalion was called back, as its flanks were exposed, and position was taken up on the forward slope facing Epinonville. The shelling was not heavy that night and our losses few, but the night was cold and the sleeping poor, for those who had any. Epinonville was a task for the morrow.

A bunch of German prisoners was being conducted along the road by the Bois de Cierges. They were being shelled unmercifully by the German batteries and naturally they were on the "double quick." The guard in the rear of the bunch was a little fellow and could hardly keep up. "Hold on or I'll brain one of you," he shouted. Of course the prisoners did not understand. The little fellow struggled manfully to keep up.

"Bleiben Sie da, bleiben Sie da" (remain there, remain there), shouted two American officers to some Germans in a dugout. The Americans were suspicious when no one came out, for they thought they had been ordering the Germans out. Then they dropped a hand grenade into the dugout.

The faithful old steed was sent sky-high by an H. E. and lodged in the top of a tree coming down

CHAPTER X

EPINONVILLE

DURING the night, the Germans came back to Epinonville in strength and morning found the self-same task of forcing them out again. The one-pounders barked away furiously, securing some excellent hits, supported by our machine guns. Toward ten o'clock we had a foothill on the Epinonville slope and gradually worked most of the regiment across the little valley. But the Germans contested the passage hotly. Their snipers and machine guns were active and caught a considerable number of our men. But the worst, the most sickening experience of the whole war, which came nearer to ruining morale than anything else, was when our own artillery, which had been shelling Epinonville, began to fall short and come crashing in among our own men. Shell after shell came into the little valley from our guns, plunking amidst our men. For the first and only time doubt and indecision displayed themselves. Little groups halted in their advance, uncertain whether to go forward or retire under this new and unexpected danger. The dreadful cry, and there is no worse in its terrible meaning, of "Raise the artillery," began. It tells the sickening story of American soldiers killed and wounded by their own guns. Frantic rocket signals were sent up one after another, calling for increase of range, but the shells continued to fall in the same area. Colonel John Henry "Gatling Gun" Parker of San Juan Hill fame, wounded and decorated several times previously in the European fighting, tumbled into the midst of this, a towering figure, easily six feet three, with his enormous pipe smoking and brandishing a cane like a young sapling, and swearing like a trooper.

The Colonel waved the regiment forward with that cane, his voice sounding over the whole field. The doubts disappeared, the men went forward, and soon the artillery raised its range. But the mistake had cost some casualties.

Gaining the reverse slope before Epinonville, the regiment went into a grapple with the Germans for possession of the town. The Boche were strongly fortified there, with machine guns in profusion and snipers busy from all points of the compass. The town in itself was small. It was a huddle of ruined buildings, but with many hiding places for the deadly machine gun. Our right flank was exposed and from that side came considerable fire. One battalion was pushed out to the right to cover the flank, but could not advance on account of an open space of 400 yards, across which came a deadly hail of machine-gun bullets from nests in the woods at the other side.

The town itself was a stickler, for snipers and many machine guns kept up a heavy fire that cost several attempted advances heavily. Gradually, however, the Germans were pushed out of the town, but immediately they took up new position beyond it. But the Germans paid heavy at Epinonville. About 100 of them suddenly appeared, crossing a clearing in close formation, as if in utter ignorance of the Americans' immediate presence. Captain Elijah Worsham of the Machine Gun Company (later killed), saw them from the hiding place of three of his own guns. Worsham opened up with the three guns. The slaughter was terrific. The Germans, caught unawares, did not know where to run, and stood huddled in temporary paralysis. The guns played back and forth over them like a hose with a wide-spraying sprinkler. They fell like rotten fruit from a tree.

The reverse slope on which the regiment lay stretched east and west in a gentle bend. On our left the other regiment of our brigade—the 361st—was packed in tightly, meeting the same sort of opposition. Our right flank was entirely open.

A few kilometers on our right, Montfaucon, a round hill that dominated the surrounding country, rose sheer out of the level floor. It was heavily fortified, the most important strong-point of the Germans in the Argonne. In it was the famous dugout of the German crown prince. The entrance was sunk in the reverse slope of the hill. On top of the dugout was some sixty feet of earth, through which ran a powerful periscope by which the crown prince watched the many attacks on Verdun, easily seen some ten kilometers away.

Our right flank being open, brought down on our brigades artillery fire from all that front, shelling which came sweeping along the ridge to catch us sideways. The angle was hard to get, many of the shells falling harmlessly in the little valley, others hitting with terrible effect among the men tightly packed on the slope. A hit was known for hundreds of yards around by the cry of "First aid!" that went up, sung out by those near and repeated up and down the line, until orders were passed silencing such cries.

Shells from our direct front on clearing the ridge generally fell in the little valley, for the steep slope of the hill prevented them from hitting shorter. So most of our artillery troubles came from the right flank. A machine gun platoon, waiting near the regimental aid station, was hit by a German heavy. Another shell made a direct hit on the first-aid station; another registered directly on brigade headquarters, killing an officer and several men.

It was with the gladdest of hearts that the regiment saw thin, brown lines come creeping over the ridge behind us on our right, crossing the little valley and marching up the slope to take position on the line on our right. Shells were falling heavily around them, but luckily without many hits. As they came up the hill the bursts increased in number, mostly oblique fire from the right. Suddenly platoon after platoon, marching up the hill, turned round and started back. One by one, every unit in that division marched to the rear. There was no panic. The men kept their lines in wonderfully good order, under a fire that became withering. As they crossed the valley again and started up the slope in our rear, the German artillery followed them, burst after burst coming in their midst. Up the slope the bursting shells tagged them, crashing along the top of the ridge, scattering men and mules and carts as they appeared against the skyline before going down the reverse side. Their loss must have been heavy. The reason for going back our regiment never knew. It was not panic, for the men were as cool as mortals could be. There was no running or frightened scurrying, but steady marching under good control. Our flank was again exposed, with the battalion covering it up against a hard position, under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire. But they hung on, for had their weakness allowed an attack to sweep in that way, it would have gone badly with the regiment. The afternoon slowly passed. The Germans were pushed further beyond Epinonville, but only to another strong position. Their hits were fairly frequent, and our losses considerable, but the morale of the men kept at a high pitch.

Both officers and men of the 91st Division, the 37th Division, and the 35th Division, say emphatically that aeroplane support in the Argonne was lacking. The artillery backing up those divisions say the same thing, for their officers state it was impossible to get aeroplane observations of their firing, without which accurate getting on the target is impossible. Nor were they furnished reports and locations of targets by the aeroplanes.

That reverse slope near Epinonville, which was raked and harried by the German artillery, was known to those who were there as "Hell's Hill." That afternoon, as the brigade lay there, with no further protection than that of a small hole dug in the hillside, German planes sailed over at will. They came singly, they came in twos, they came in groups of seven or eight, and they came without hindrance of American planes. Seven in one group, flying so low the pilots were easily distinguishable, flew up our lines with their machine guns going full blast at us and flew back down our lines with their machine guns going full blast.

And the only defense was our own machine guns and our rifles, for when the aeroplanes opened fire every man with a rifle let loose with his own, with a rattling and a popping and a banging that filled the air with lead and buoyed up the spirits, but didn't do a bit of harm to the Boche fliers, who let loose with several extra salvos before flying off leisurely.

At frequent intervals Boche planes came over, sailed up the lines and down the lines, until, curiosity satisfied, they sent out rockets or dropped streamers to give the exact range to the artillery. And in each case in a few minutes after, the German shells would come singing over.

Occasionally an American plane came over. A few battles were seen in the air, often without results. Once an aeroplane, whether Allied or Boche was unknown, came crashing to earth some distance away, but too far to determine its identity.

Dusk finally came that afternoon on "Hell's Hill," with the Germans firing slowly but steadily. By that time everyone had dug himself a small hole, for protection against the bursting shells. The one-pounders and the bayonet had cleared out many of the machine-gun nests and most of the snipers, who had been picking away with success all day long.

Night time was not very pleasant. The position, though fairly secure, was not impregnable, and extra precautions were taken against a night attack. The lines were strengthened by more rifles and the machine guns hidden at strategic points. With darkness, the Germans commenced a heavier firing. Shelling in the daytime is not half as bad as at night. The lack of light is confusing, especially when the Boche lobbs over gas shells that call for the mask, and that night, along with his high explosives, he mixed in gas shells, the first good taste the regiment had had. One high explosive shell, just about dusk, hit the shell-hole in which the five officers of Company C were huddled, studying a map. All of them were badly wounded. None of them was out of the hospital in time to rejoin the regiment before the armistice.

The Germans by this time had realized the seriousness of the Argonne drive, menacing as it did the entire German front, for the Argonne was similar to the spoke of a wheel near the hub. If pushed back too fast the wheel would revolve faster than the outer edge, the right flank up toward Belgium could move, and disaster threaten. For that reason, the Germans commenced throwing in reserves. The First Prussian Guards, one of the crack outfits of the German army; the Fifth Prussian Guards, and many others, were in the fight, as identified from insignia and documents taken from the prisoners.

Their artillery was greatly increased, evidenced by the increased fire and the testimony of prisoners. The Germans made every desperate endeavor to stem the drive. That night came word of the cutting to pieces of Major Miller's battalion of the 361st Infantry. Orders came to take over his part of the line as soon as possible. A reconnaissance of the position about half-past two in the morning showed a battalion hanging on by grim will alone. The Major was dead, all the captains killed or wounded, and a first lieutenant was in command. The battalion had been caught in a hurricane of machine-gun and artillery fire that had more than halved its ranks.

The rock quarry where battalion headquarters was established was filled with wounded, suffering agonies. Snipers and machine guns rimmed the edge every few minutes with their fire. A pale moonlight shone, and by it the Germans laid down at frequent intervals a machine-gun barrage on the crossroads or raked the woods where the remnant of the battalion lay.

By dawn our regiment had taken over the position from the 361st, that regiment going into support of us. About seven o'clock an attack by our regiment was ordered. It lay through a woods into which the German artillery streamed high explosives with considerable losses, but the outfit went on until finally gaining the reverse slope of a ridge about two and a half kilometers from the little town of Gesnes. Beyond that ridge lay hills barren of cover, strongly fortified by the Germans, and every square rod of their surface covered by machine-gun and artillery fire. It was there that on the 29th of September the 362nd Infantry was to suffer its heaviest losses.

CHAPTER XI

ATTACK ON GESNES

SEPTEMBER 29th will always be surging back in the minds of the men of the 362nd Infantry. Its scenes and deeds time can never efface so long as memory lasts. It was upon that day—September 29, 1918—that the Kriemhilde line, the German third line of defense in the Argonne, was broken for the first time by an American regiment—the 362nd.

The advance was begun at seven a. m. The regiment pushed forward across a ravine and penetrated the Bois de Cierges (woods). So many dugouts and well built houses lined the ravine that it had the appearance of a small village. Some of the officers' homes were quite pretentious and it was very apparent that the Huns had not expected to evacuate this territory.

By ten o'clock the woods had been cleared, the front advancing to a line west from the La Grange Aux Bois farm, artillery fire enflaming the line from the direction of the farm. There was heavy artillery fire from the north and west. Two kilometers ahead lay the town of Gesnes with the wooded heights of Hill 255 and another abruptly rising hill, on the immediate northwest and northeast. The terrain intervening was barren of cover. A flat tableland stretched away from the Cierges woods to a broad ravine. A low, rounding hill beyond that sloped away to the town itself.

Almost every foot of the ground was directly under the observation and fire of the Huns who had been strengthening themselves upon their formidable positions until they had fairly covered the heights with hidden machine-gun nests. So sure were they that no man could ever cross that open ground alive.

under their fire, that they had also brought up light artillery to the crest of the hill for point-blank open-sight firing.

The regiment, therefore, could advance no farther under the circumstances without inviting annihilation. The line indicated was kept until the middle of the afternoon. Meanwhile artillery support was called for and a machine-gun barrage was laid on the La Grange farm which silenced, for the time, the enemy machine-gun and light artillery fire from that direction. It was then that Colonel Parker, regimental commander, received the astounding order that the advance must be continued at all costs. To him the order seemed suicidal but he asked only for time to join his men in the carnage that was inevitable. The attack was accordingly set for three-forty p. m. Artillery preparation was called for to precede the attack. A slight quickening of fire was weakly noticeable from the few isolated "75's" in the regiment's rear. This seemed pitifully ineffective and was completely drowned out by the rumble of the enemy artillery which opened up with frightful volume precisely at the moment set for the attack.

The regiment's machine-gun units, however, responded with a magnificent barrage directed on likely points of resistance. At the moment set, the attack by the infantry was launched and the wild charge out across the open through a seething inferno began. Forward was the command received. What though it seemed to certain death! Not a man faltered or waited for another.

The hills ahead fairly belched fire and the flash of artillery firing point-blank at the advancing waves could be distinctly seen. No man could describe the fury of the barrage that was poured down upon them. But, with shouts of "Powder River," they raced forward in thinning numbers through the storm of bullets, shrapnel, high explosives and gas shells, like wild men. In an incredibly short time the distance to the town was covered. The rapidity of the advance and the utter recklessness of the charge seemed to send fear into the heart of the Huns. They fled back over the hill leaving the wounded behind. Boche artillerymen were seen madly lashing their horses drawing their pieces back to safety. They were none too soon. As it was, numbers of prisoners were captured which, under the circumstances, seems remarkable. Gesnes was taken and the advance pushed to the crest of Hill 255, one kilometer northwest of the town. This was the army objective and was reached at five-thirty p. m.

As compared to the number who began the charge, only a handful of men had emerged from the slaughter. Hundreds of dead and wounded were strewn over the battleground. Many officers were among the fallen. Colonel Parker was himself wounded early in the action and evacuated to the hospital. Lieut.-Col. J. B. Woolnough succeeded to the command and was afterward made colonel of the regiment. The burial party found the bodies of over 100 of our men in 200 yards.

Darkness was fast approaching and the regiment proceeded to prepare positions against a possible counter-attack. But soon after nightfall the order came for the regiment's withdrawal, directing that it retire to the same line which they held before the attack.

No one can describe the feelings of the men when they received the order and realized what it meant: that the ground which they had taken at such terrible cost was to be given up and that the blood of their comrades had been shed in vain. Each man felt bitterly that he had participated in a veritable "charge of the Light Brigade"—heroic, perhaps, but futile.

It was afterward learned that the commander who gave the attack order sought, to late, to withdraw it. The action had progressed as described. The regiment had achieved the impossible; it had taken positions that might well be regarded as impregnable—and had put to flight the vaunted Prussian Guards. The heavy casualties suffered were inevitable. The miracle was, as all agreed, that a single man of them had survived. Now they stood with feet firmly planted upon the army objective, out two kilometers in advance of the great American line in the Argonne. But they stood alone and their flanks were exposed to the dangerous depth because units on their right and left had failed to advance.

The withdrawal ordered was accomplished, although some of the outposts did not rejoin the regiment until the next morning.

As the men fell back in the darkness they gathered up most of the wounded. The night was black and cold and rain that was half sleet fell at fitful intervals. The moaning cries of the wounded seemed to come from everywhere out of the darkness. Here and there a man was found wandering about among the dead and wounded like a lost child; rendered so by the terrible shock and horror of the carnage. How unutterably sad and heartrending, how awful is the aftermath of a war-swept battlefield—and especially if fought in vain!

Bringing Home the Bacon—Two German high officials

"Keep out of that dugout! Search 'em, quick," gasps an officer, fearing treachery. The prisoners are lined up, and one slightly wounded American private detailed to take them to the rear. "Come along, youse," he says, lighting up a cigarette, and making as if to start off at the head of the willing column, with the sling of his rifle over his shoulder and chest. "Wait a moment; I want to speak to you," yells the worried officer, who then whispers in the doughboy's ear, "Unwind that rifle from your throat so you can use it." "Yessir. Giddap, youse Heinies!" "Come back here," shouts the officer again. "What the hell do you think you're on—a picnic? Don't turn your back on that column! Get behind 'em!" "Yessir; good idea," and off he wanders.

CHAPTER XII

THE MORNING AFTER

THE day after Gesnes was one of loggish stupor, the 362nd Regiment lying in support behind the front line held by the 361st Regiment. It was in a little woods—Bois des Epinettes—mostly shrubbery that hardly topped a man's head, with here and there a twelve-foot tree. But in shellholes under this brush, and in the few shacks scattered throughout the woods, the men lay, their minds heavy with the horror of the last day, their bodies bruised and exhausted, with no more spirit than the mud under them.

That day brought the bitter realization of the terrible losses the regiment had suffered. The handful of men, all that remained of companies nearly 200 strong, were checked for a list of the dead and wounded.

Captains commanded battalions, lieutenants companies, and sergeants platoons, so great had been the slaughter. One company had eighteen men left of its 179. Few companies ran as high as seventy-five. But a skeleton of the regiment remained, and that skeleton was gaunt, exhausted, vitality lowered by lack of good food, absence of sleep and the horrors through which it had walked. The glory of the attack was tinsel beside the thinned ranks.

But even in that hour of depression the soul of the regiment was born. The men had faced death and suffered privations with nonchalant bravery, and Gesnes had furnished the acid test. The great question, "What will I do in battle?" had been settled for each man. And the answer made of the regiment an organization that to its day of demobilization faced its tasks with confidence.

The Germans filtered back quickly into Gesnes. Their artillery returned to the same heights and was soon busy searching out the woods for concealed infantry. Everyone dug himself in without orders, for the American soldier has the national faculty of taking care of himself. That trait contributed much to the success of the American army. The firing was intermittent, at times heavy, at other times light; gas shells mixed occasionally with high explosive.

"For Kaiser und Reich"

It picked off a few men here and there, but compared to the losses suffered the previous day, the fatalities were few.

And there, in spite of artillery fire and in the absence of good cover, the Supply Company and the cooks brought up the rolling kitchens and that night hot chow was served, steaming stew and boiling coffee, the first warm food the regiment had for five days. Shells fell all around the kitchens, but the cooks stuck to their work. One shell, a dud, fell between two kitchens.

For four more nights the regiment hung on in the Argonne, in the face of the lets, spread through the regiment, a weakening scourge that made life a burden, but only those unable to stand went to the hospital.

On the night of October 4th orders came that the division would be relieved that night to march to the rest billets for recuperation and replacements. The 32nd Division took over the line, coming in about midnight.

Each regiment marched out that night, making its way as best it could to the woods in the rear assigned to it. The 362nd Infantry was ordered to Cheppy Woods, finally reached after a long march, the men flopping wherever they stopped and spending the little that remained of the night and much of the day in exhausted slumber. Boche planes flew over in numbers, but by that time no one cared much. Officers and men were in the grip of dysentery and weakness. A little reserve store of strength was all that kept them from the hospital. That afternoon the regiment received orders to move a kilometer farther on in the woods before resuming the march that night to rest billets. Shortly after reaching the new camp the rain came down in torrents, but rest billets kept up the spirits. The 182nd Brigade, consisting of the 363rd and 364th Infantry, moved out that evening for their billets. As the 181st Brigade was getting ready, orders came that it had been attached to the First Division for further fighting. What a sickening sinking of the heart there was throughout the whole regiment! Hardly an officer or man had more than the necessary strength to pull himself along. The companies were but skeletons of their former selves. Nearly all the automatic riflemen had been killed or wounded and their weapons lost. Grenades were lacking and everyone was filthy dirty. The mud had gone through to the underclothes. The underclothes stuck. The brigade was tottering in its weakness.

But orders are orders, and in accordance with the plans of the First Division, the regiment marched that same night back the weary road it had come. That night was dark and the rain was pelting down. The roads were a jam and a tangle of infantry, artillery, machine guns and wagon trains.

Slipping along a paved highway in an auto with bright headlights is pleasant at night. Trudging along a muddy road, with a heavy pack on your back, in the inky blackness, is a test of endurance.

The 362nd Infantry followed the roads until near Eclisfontaine, in which it had fought a week before, then cut straight across an old No-Mans-Land by compass to escape heavy shelling Eclisfontaine was getting from the Germans. The First Division had ordered the regiment to take cover in a little woods near Eclisfontaine. When daybreak came, information from French artillery firing from the woods showed the situation to be about the same as when the regiment left the line. The Germans were fighting the old game of machine guns and artillery.

And during the day the reason why the 181st Brigade was ordered back to the fighting, while the 182nd Brigade went on its happy way to billets, was discovered. A gap had widened between the flank units of the First Division and the 32nd Division and the 181st Brigade was to cover that hole. The 361st Regiment was ordered into the front line first, while the 362nd was in support, taking the same sort of shelling it had been having ever since the jump-off in the Argonne. A difficult position to take faced the 361st. Hill 288 was the highest point in the region beyond Gesnes, which had been forced by a flanking attack, the Germans retiring when further holding became dangerous. Across Hill 288 ran a sunken road, in which machine guns, twenty-five or thirty, had been placed, their fire holding up a frontal attack and the advance on the flanks as well. A frontal attack against it would have been suicidal. When the 362nd Infantry relieved the 361st the situation was the same. Our lines were pushed well up the slope of 288. Our one-pounders were trained on it, but to no avail. Artillery was called for, to smash the top of the hill to smithereens, but owing to lack of aeroplane observation little success was had in the accurate placing of the shells. And in the meantime, during those days, the shelling went on at its regular rate, the Germans taking a daily toll. To this list was added the killings of the machine guns at 288.

And one day, as shells were falling fairly heavy, the little field telephone rang. An officer from headquarters, some four kilometers in the rear, was talking. "Have you a pot of glue that you can send back to me to paste some maps?" he asked. He never got the glue, but the receiver was dropped so he could hear what bursting shells sounded like.

About October 10th, orders were known to be on their way for the relief of the First Division. Hope sprung high again, only to be dashed to the ground when the 181st Brigade received orders it was attached to the 32nd Division.

But after days and nights of shelling, suffering, dirt and death, when it had become a joke that the brigade had been forgotten, orders came for relief on the 12th. About midnight the relief began and was finished at dawn. And there never was a happier march than that. Tired, weak, some slightly staggering, companies made their way back to the gathering point near Eclisfontaine. From there the regiment began its march to the rear. The regiment was a sorry spectacle. Intense company pride kept the poor men from falling out by the wayside, only those in whom the last ounce of energy had departed taking to the ambulance. When camp would be made at night in the damp woods, officers and men flopped to the ground. Dysentery still raged, further weakening the men. And between dysentery and risk of bullets, most would have taken the latter.

Camp was made one night near the little town of Avocourt, or where the little town once stood, for then it was only a four-road crossing, with an M. P. on guard, and round about the dust of crumbled bricks. Beyond the town the regiment pitched pup tents and rolling kitchens started chow. Their fires gleamed brightly as the cooks crowded the blaze to hurry mess. A little red-faced colonel of a Pioneer Regiment, working on the roads in the vicinity, rushed up breathless to exclaim against the fires, because a Boche bomber had "dropped an egg" there a week ago. Just a difference of viewpoint. Were the Russian Soldiers' Council system in use, every man in the regiment would have voted for cooking that chow full blast, Boche planes or not. But to soothe all hands, the fires were eased down a bit and their flare hidden.

After three days and nights of marching, Revigny was reached, where each regiment loaded itself in turn, men, horses, wagons and baggage for somewhere.

CHAPTER XIII

ON TO BELGIUM

AND that somewhere was not rest billets, but Belgium. What was on, no one knew, but to Belgium the 91st Division went, the trains rushing north with right of way over everything on the tracks. A journey of thirty-six hours deposited the regiment in the little kingdom. Through Ypres and Passchendale the regiment marched, through as desolate a country as there is on earth or in hell. Mile after mile, as far as the eye could reach, muddled earth, shellhole inside shellhole, not a square yard of level earth anywhere between shellholes. The mashed-in remains of old trenches, tons of barbed wire tangled and torn from the many barrages, tanks caved in by artillery as they floundered forward in attack; scattered everywhere, helmets, broken cart wheels, rusty rifles, shattered one-pounders, bits of uniform sticking out of the earth—all grisly reminders of the titanic struggle waged for Ypres. One part of the regiment had orders to report to headquarters at Passchendale. Marching by night, they arrived at a cross-roads where they believed Passchendale should have been. To find the town they asked a French soldier on duty where Passchendale was. The laconic answer came of "Ici," the "here" of French. And there it was, a red blotch in the darkness, flat as a pancake; just a glint of dull color from its crumbled bricks. The main body of the regiment marched to Moost, around which it went into billets in ruined houses, for there was not an undamaged building in the vicinity. Moost was nothing but eight or ten houses in one place, with many farmhouses scattered round it. It was some ten or twelve kilometers from Roulers, a good-sized town of Belgium which the Germans had held during all the war. The Germans had been driven from Roulers but five days before the 91st Division reached Belgium. Eight days were spent in this area.

One thousand two hundred and thirty-five replacements were received from the 84th Division while here, and these men, although trained at Camp Sherman, Ohio, were not experienced in actual warfare. They were drafted from Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, with a very few from Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri.

On October 28th, the regiment moved toward the front and after a 17-kilometer hike landed us in Lendeledede, where we spent the night in pasture lands—some in farm buildings. A German plane flew over during the early hours of the evening and caused the soldiers to eat a half-cooked supper, the result of several bombs that dropped nearby, but no one was hurt.

By far the greater part of the combat divisions of the American Expeditionary Forces fought their battles in the region between Metz and Soissons. But as though it was prearranged that at least some American troops should experience battle under all the conditions presented by the western front, the 362nd Infantry concluded its active service in that region close to the sea, which for centuries has been known as the "cockpit of Europe"—Belgian Flanders. It was here, into this land that had witnessed so many struggles between liberty and despotism in one form or another, that the 91st Division had been sent fresh from their hard-fought battles in the Argonne. Placed at the disposal of King Albert of Belgium, this division was assigned to aid the French army in Belgium, also operating under his command, in driving the enemy beyond the Scheldt river some fourteen kilometers distant.

The 91st Division was ordered to relieve the 164th French Division on the front between the villages of Waereghem and Steenbregge. The French had been held up here by a most difficult obstacle—a sparsely wooded knoll known as Spittalls Bosschen, which extended across the center of the sector. Beyond lay a series of gentle ridges, and villages gradually descending toward the ancient city of Audenarde on the bank of the Scheldt itself, then in possession of the Huns. General J. Linson disposed of the division for attack with the Second and Third Battalions of the 362nd Regiment in the front line.

Toward nightfall of October 29th, the Second and Third Battalions began the march toward the front.

CHAPTER XIV

THE BATTLE IN THE TURNIP PATCHES

THE men who had been through the Argonne campaign were calm and self-possessed. The new men who had joined the regiment only a few days before, were undergoing a strange feeling. It was their first time at the front. Only those who have marched for the first time towards flaming Very lights flashing on the sky-line can ever know the mighty struggle that takes place in a man's soul. Booming guns and screaming shells do not add to one's self-possession.

Several times during the night planes droned overhead, dropping bombs intended for villages and dumps, which fell close to some of our advancing boys. The French guides who had been sent to lead the regiment into position had difficulty in finding their way and it was not until daylight that the relief of the French unit was accomplished. Outposts were established and the main body of the men kept under cover in barns and houses. During the day several deaths occurred from shell fire. The fact that the shelling was not heavier was due mainly to the Allied control of the air. In the Argonne, Boche planes came over at will; here, the British and French airmen seemed to control the situation.

The plan of attack was received about nine p. m., directing that all units be in position by midnight. Part of the Second and Third Battalions made the assaulting units and were ordered into the front line. The First Battalion was held back in support. Positions were accordingly taken up in the open fields and turnip patches that seemed to cover the entire area. The men dug in well and awaited the zero hour, then known to be five-thirty a. m. of the following morning. Nervous waiting for the five-minute drum fire and creeping barrage which was to precede the attack made minutes days, and hours years. During the night the Boche artillery was quite active and sent over frequent gas shells which necessitated the use of the mask.

Promptly at the zero hour the American and French batteries opened fire along the entire front and the five-minute artillery preparation began. Instantly the sky was ablaze with the flaming star shells and rockets sent up from the enemy's lines. Their artillery responded immediately with a well-directed counter-barrage, which grew in intensity until it became one of the most concentrated the regiment had yet endured. Many gas shells were effectively used, and peculiarly the morning wind chanced to be from the east and carried the gas back over our entire area.

The soft soil prevented heavy casualties, although high explosives and shrapnel were seemingly tearing up every foot of ground and frequently half-burying the men where they lay, by geysers of dirt and turnips thrown up by the bursting shells.

At five-thirty-five a. m. the assault wave "went-over-the-top"—going forward in the slowly fading darkness through a storm of machine-gun bullets and shrapnel.

The advance was pushed steadily all morning against stiff resistance, particularly by heavy machine-gun fire from hidden positions in Spitalles Bosschen. By noon the regiment had encircled the northern part of the wood and brought its left flank within a few hundred meters of the first objective. About this time the right of the regiment was halted to allow the 41st French Division to come up abreast of it, then the attack was continued, and by nightfall the regiment had worked skillfully through the woods, overcoming many machine-gun nests in concealed and unexpected places and practically cleared the entire tract up to the first objective.

For the main part the day's fighting had been of a different character than the regiment had encountered in the Argonne, but it was scarcely less deadly. Here the men fought from hedge to hedge and from house to house, but as usual the natural advantages of the terrain were in favor of the enemy.

The fighting cost the 362nd four officers and forty-five enlisted men in killed, and one hundred and seventy-five in wounded. The dead were buried where they fell.

In the cellar of one farmhouse a group of the boys discovered a whole Belgian family hiding terror-stricken. Their joy on discovering that the Huns had been driven off and that the Americans were now in possession, knew no bounds. The women wept for joy and embraced their deliverers, who were made to feel like real heroes in spite of their momentary embarrassment.

Two of the Boys Buried Where They Fell

In a nearby yard lay the bodies of 35 Huns, mostly treacherous machine-gunners, and in another strongly defended yard farther on lay ten others where they had fallen, showing how desperately the enemy had fought. But the "wild westerners" had been more than a match for the Boche, not withstanding the fact that he had been warned to prepare for the attack. It was afterward learned from captured German orders that the German troops knew of the impending attack and had been expected to withstand it. The captured order read in part:

"In the morning it will be necessary to withstand a hostile attack. Opposed to you is the 91st Division. An extra eighteen days' leave of absence will be given for every prisoner brought in."

Many citations had been given the men of this unit, but this special recognition, coming from the Boche himself, was regarded by the men as the highest tribute of all. We felt flattered and not a little proud that a price should be set upon our heads in an effort to encourage the Hun soldiers to hold their ground against us. Needless to say, the only men taken prisoners that day were Germans. Some of them evidently concluded that the only way to secure a "leave-of-absence" was to take it, for, when the regiment resumed the advance the following morning they found none to oppose them. The Germans had fled during the night—a few lay in cold sleep, killed perhaps in the effort to secure the coveted furlough and gain the extra reward. It was the kind the kaiser well knew they would get.

Throughout the morning the swift advance was not resisted except by artillery fire, and the regiment moved forward into and beyond Wortegem, establishing a line of resistance along the crest of Wortegem about five kilometers west of Audenarde with a line of observation on the last crest overlooking that city.

Two nights were spent on this ridge in readiness for a counter-attack, while reconnoitering parties endeavored to find practicable river crossings within the division sector; they were now on the opposite banks of the famous Scheldt river—the backbone of the German line. All the permanent bridges had been destroyed, however, and no crossing could be found.

Meantime one of the leading battalions entered Audenarde and mopped up the town. Plans for the crossing of the Scheldt were already well underway when orders for the withdrawal of the division were received.

The division had completed the mission originally assigned of driving the enemy beyond the Scheldt, and had restored about thirty square kilometers to Belgium. In taking Audenarde, the distinction was won of capturing the largest city, except Chateau-Thierry, which was directly conquered by American troops during the war.

The regiment was relieved from the line on November 3rd, and moved back during the night, billeting in barns and farmhouses near Oyghem. The Belgian people evidenced considerable anxiety during the early evening hours, thinking that a retreat was in progress.

During the next few days the regiment followed a drill schedule and cleaned up. There were occasional bombings by German planes at night from which one or two casualties resulted. Men spent their spare moments in attacking the cooties which had greatly multiplied. "Reading the shirt" became the favorite indoor sport. Hot food took the place of the raw turnips pulled fresh from the fields over which the men had fought, that had formed their diet during the days at the front. There may still be some who claim never to have "entertained visitors." But others will tell you how their pets wore service stripes and wound chevrons, and would not only answer to name, but also fall in, count off, and do a perfect "squads right."

"* * * On my shirt they do 'right dress,'
Number off and march to mess,—
They run wild, simply wild, over me."

On the morning of the 9th, General Johnston reviewed the regiment and announced that another French army corps—the 30th—desired assistance in their next offensive, and at noon we again took up the march toward the front, to a point south of Oycke. Here the regiment was halted until late in the afternoon, when it moved on into the town of Bevere for the night.

Many rumors concerning the pending armistice were heard. It was known that if the Germans failed to sign, the regiment would cross the Scheldt, on the morning of the eleventh, and push forward to participate in a new attack. The dawn of the morrow was, therefore, awaited with profound hopefulness by the men. Eight o'clock a. m., the eleventh, found the regiment in Audenarde moving toward the Scheldt when the historic order was received, directing that all hostilities were to cease at the eleventh hour. The advance continued no farther and there was no demonstration on the part of the men. The news brought general expressions of satisfaction, but caused no excitement. Everyone was glad, but received the announcement in the way that soldiers learn to accept any situation, whether portending life or death—without visible emotion. They smilingly nodded assent to the gleeful shout of passing French soldiers, "La Guerre est fini!"

Yes, the war was ended at last, and each man was busy with his own thoughts—thoughts that he had long since resolutely shut out from his mind; but now he dared once more to vision the future and dream again of life and love and home.

After moving several times during the day, the regiment went into billets in and near the village of Oycke.

Major Edmonds was seated in a Belgian house with his back to the wall. Chaplain Hagan was at his feet. A shell came through the wall above the Major's head. Chaplain Hagan started for the door. As he reached it a shell burst in the chicken coop and a rooster flopped stunned at the Chaplain's feet. Chaplain Hagan was dazed. The rooster "came to" first and ran cackling away. "Why didn't you grab that rooster, Hagan?" said the Major. "He would have made a good dinner."

"I didn't think of that," said Hagan.

There were sixty-five machine guns and sixteen cannons captured in this cemetery. A large imposing monument stands in the center of the cemetery erected by the Germans at the expense of the Belgian city of 32,000 francs. The flower beds cost 30,000 francs additional. It was rumored the monument would be torn down by the inhabitants.

THE HOB-NAIL ROUTE THROUGH BELGIUM

WITH the coming of the armistice came the most disheartening period of service. While the war was on, the task of beating the Germans sustained the army throughout hardships and suffering. With that done, the why and wherefore of being in Europe longer was incomprehensible to the soldier. The American army was a war army, not a peace army. It stood the rigors of battle excellently. The restrictions and annoyances of garrison life, however, taxed its patience, though it submitted gracefully and good-spiritedly. But after the armistice, there was little interest in the work.

Fall Out—Keep packs on—and keep out of turnip patches—“Join the army and see the world”

The United States was in everyone's thoughts, with the quickest way of getting a steamer thereto. For six weeks after the armistice the 362nd Infantry was shifted around Belgium, “touring the country on foot,” as the soldiers put it, moving here and moving there and poorly off in rations and clothing on account of distance from the American supplies. Billets for the men were lofts in barns, ruined houses or the “elephant huts,” of corrugated iron, shaped in a semi-circle. Wood was difficult to obtain, the billets were cold and sleeping colder. The regiment nearly all the time was in districts which were in or bordered on the old No-Man's-Land. The whole countryside was gutted of conveniences. It rained frequently, and the country roundabout was a bog in which one floundered if he left the cobblestone roads. Drill or training was seldom possible, and the days, and more especially the nights, passed slowly.

The regiment was at Oyeke from November 11th until November 18th. The chill of winter was settling down on Belgium, and caused the men to spend uncomfortable nights in their crude quarters. But every soldier felt that he owed much to his Creator for deliverance on the field of battle, and no doubt most of the boys prayed daily for a speedy return to America.

Rumors were as numerous as squads in the regiment. Some ordered the 362nd to Germany via Brussels; others sent it across the channel to England; another class had it on its way to Mexico to start another war; and when the march was resumed towards the east on the morning of November 18th, the first class were quite sure that they had given out the right dope. The march took the regiment through Audenarde. Many of the buildings had been destroyed by shell fire. The railroad depot and tracks, together with the bridges over the Scheldt river, had been destroyed intentionally by the Boche during their retreat. The soldiers crossed the Scheldt on a bridge recently constructed by the Engineering Corps, and an hour later found them in billets around or near the little village of Maeter, some six kilometers east of Audenarde. The regiment remained at Maeter three nights and two days. Part of the men were billeted in buildings of a Catholic Sisters' school, occupied by the German soldiers only a few days before. A Sister showed some of the officers a room where two German officers had been killed by their own men for reasons unknown. A number of Germans were buried in the churchyard, the recent date on the wooden crosses revealing the fact that they had died just before the armistice was signed. A regimental parade was held at Maeter. The men were drilled in the muddy fields surrounding the village—and only large sacks of mail from home made our hearts glad.

On November 21st we again started the hob-nail route. After five hours of smooth sailing over cobblestones we landed at Grootenberge, to spend two nights and one day, for what, no one knew. The American soldiers were a curiosity for the natives. They had never come in contact with them before. As the companies marched into the village the children lined up along the road and yelled, "Vive Les Americains." They seemed glad to meet their new deliverers after more than four years of oppression by the German army. Not a few letters bulged with some article of hand-made Belgium lace as they started toward America. It was the handiwork of brave Belgian women, done at odd moments perhaps when not under the watchful eye of the Huns during the four long years of servitude.

Words cannot express the joy on the soldiers' faces when the regiment started west on the morning of November 23d. They were now faced towards home. The cobblestone roads were no longer hard. That night they billeted in the villages of Saethem, St. Marie and Bierlegem and the next day found them in the shell-torn villages of Gothem and Grammene. A railroad ran thru Grammene and it was supposed that we would do no more hiking—but great was our disappointment. Nine days later drill—drill—drill—and the usual fatigue duty passed the time except for brief services on Thanksgiving Day.

Again the hob-nail route set the regiment in motion on December 4th, for one day only. In general, the quarters were much better at Mulebeke as it was a fair-sized town and had not been damaged by war. A large bathhouse used by the Germans revealed the reason for the move—and for the next three days a rigid attempt was made to rid the soldiers of cooties.

December 7th saw the regiment take the road again, and at day-break we began the march across perhaps the most-talked-of No-Man's-Land of the whole war. Space does not permit a description of that day's scenes, but to see was to appreciate four years of trench life. The destroyed villages and farms were pathetic reminders of the wastefulness of war, and the countless wooden crosses marking the spots where brave soldiers gave their lives, made our hearts jerk but it gave us new courage for the afternoon's march—through Ypres sector. That night the regiment went into billets at Oostveleteren and Stavele. Some of the companies were billeted in homes and barns while others drew barracks previously used by the British Tommies for rest billets during the days of trench fighting.

The regiment remained here until January 1, 1919, spending the days in drill, athletics, games, hikes, school work, and attempts to outwit the cooties and banish them forever. An entertainment company called the "Powder River Gang" put on several shows in an English war theater near Oostveleteren.

At Christmas time a sum of money was gathered from among the different companies and used to buy presents for the children of Oostveleteren. The presents were purchased in Dunkirk and consisted of dolls, colored balls, American flags, candy, oranges, and nuts. A tree was set up in the English theater and decorated with candles, and the children and their parents gathered there on Christmas afternoon to listen to short talks from the town mayor and the village curate. The regimental band furnished music. The distribution of presents caused a stampede among the children with no small amount of excitement among the older people, and the day made many a heart glad that had not been so for four long years.

Several hundred francs remained after purchasing the Christmas presents for the children. This money was given to poor families in the village. A sum equivalent to eighty dollars was presented to a widow and family of seven children, all under fifteen years of age. The joy expressed on the faces of this household after the presentation of the gift will never be forgotten by the soldiers of the 362nd Infantry.

In Flanders fields the poppies grow
Between the crosses row on row,
That mark our place, and in the sky
The larks, still bravely singing, fly,
Scarce heard amid the guns below.

We are the dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe!
To you, from failing hands, we throw
The torch! Be yours to lift it high!
If ye break faith with us who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies blow
In Flanders fields.

CHAPTER XVI

HOMeward BOUND

NEW Year's Day found most of the regiment enroute from Belgium to the debarkation area about Le Mans, France, passing Versailles on the afternoon of January first. The following historical facts will refresh your memory about the importance of this ancient French city: Versailles is a town of 50,000 or more inhabitants, clustering about the palace and the park which are so closely a part of the history of France. It is just twelve miles from the heart of Paris, scarcely separated from the city, so thickly the intervening suburbs to the southwest of the city have grown up. Three hundred years ago the spot was a sandy plateau, high enough above the surrounding country to make its air sweet and fresh.

Versailles Palace, Where Peace Treaty Was Born

Louis XIII. often hunted in its woods. He had done little to change the place from its virgin condition when he was succeeded by his son, Louis XIV., the Magnificent. And "the Magnificent" made it his playground. One hundred million dollars—a big sum even in these days, but at that time an amount which fairly staggered the imagination—was poured out in building the palace and the gardens and in filling them with works of art. The site lacking water, great sums were spent in constructing waterworks systems to bring it from a distance. The royal revenues were used recklessly. Louis XIV., frightened for a moment as he gazed at the accounts, tore the bills into fragments so that his people might not know what they had been. The park of Versailles is perhaps a mile square, an enormous basin in the shape of a cross quartering it at its center. On its eastern edge, nearest Paris, stands the Palace of Versailles, the houses of the town huddled around it and the palace chapel rising above it. At the northwestern corner of the park, a half mile from the palace in which the peace negotiations took place, is the chateau of the Grand Trianon. The Palace of Versailles was used not only by Louis XIV. but also as a permanent residence for his court. It consists of two wings, each 400 feet long, separated by a central court which is about 200 feet square. The two wings are linked together by a square building which juts out into the green gardens and overlooks the fountains in the center of the park. The corridor along the western face of this central building—240 feet in length, thirty-five feet in width and forty-two feet in height from its tassellated floor to its arched ceiling—is known as the Hall of Mirrors. It is in this stately room that the peace conference was held. Opposite the seventeen large arched windows which command such a beautiful view of the gardens is a corresponding number of beveled mirrors, set in the wall. Cynics who set little faith in the permanence of treaties have said: "Statesmen who sit in a glass house should not be surprised if nations throw stones." But the world is perennially hopeful. Just opposite the center of this "Gallery of Mirrors," toward the inner court, is the historic bedchamber of Louis XIV., in which his richly adorned bedstead is still preserved. Flanking the bedchamber to the right and left are two ante-chambers, the bull's-eye (so called from one of its windows, an oval), and the Council Hall, in which the king's couriers used to await him. The Hall of Mirrors, the king's various apartments, and indeed all of the 150 rooms and halls of the palace, are filled with priceless tapestries. To them cling the whispers of countless days and nights of royal folly that came to an end with Louis XVIII. The value of the art treasures in the palace may be estimated at $5,000,000, but the millions that have been squandered in those rooms can never be added up. In the Hall of Mirrors was consummated, on January 18, 1871, the treaty ending the Franco-Prussian war, by which France lost Alsace and Lorraine and was forced to pay to Germany $1,000,000,000. Twelve days previously the victorious Germans had insultingly chosen this same hall for the scene of the coronation of Wilhelm I., king of Prussia, as emperor of Germany. Nearly one hundred years previously—on September 3, 1783—Great Britain and the American colonies signed their treaty of peace in that room.

The ride in the usual boxcars ended at La Ferte-Bernard—an interesting old city—which was chosen as 91st Division headquarters during the period that it was to remain in the debarkation area. The 362nd Regiment was billeted in smaller towns within a radius of thirty kilometers, or a day's march, from La Ferte-Bernard. Headquarters located at St. Cosme de Vair. The Third Battalion was stationed at Monce and St. Vincent Des Pres, while the main body of the Second Battalion was billeted in St. Remy Des Mons. The city of Le Mans was about forty kilometers southwest of this area. The regiment had entrained in Belgium with high hopes of a speedy return home. Only a short stay in the debarkation center was anticipated. Instead, there followed another long trying period of anxious waiting. For more than ten long weeks the regiment remained in this section while rumor ran rampant which sent the regiment to Siberia, Mexico, Germany, or elsewhere—but never home.

The time was spent in drill and in cleaning up old clothes and equipment. This required much rubbing, scrubbing and washing. Rigorous measures were taken to entirely rid the regiment of the "cooties," which seemed to persist in spite of past efforts to destroy them. Some new clothing and equipment were issued, which were greatly needed, and especially were the men in need of shoes. During this period the 91st Division was reviewed by General Pershing. As the ranking regiment of the division, the 362nd Infantry led the review. The dilapidated shoes instantly caught the eye of the Commander-in-Chief of the American Forces. He sternly said: "The men who took Gesnes deserve better shoes than those."

Some of the Boys See Paris

A pleasing incident that will be remembered by men of the regiment was the visit of their old colonel who was wounded in the celebrated charge on Gesnes, in the Argonne. Hearing that the 362nd was about to return home, Colonel Parker came from Paris, where he had been stationed after leaving the hospital, to see once more the men whom he had commanded in their first fight. The admiration and regard which he expressed for them was returned by every man in the regiment. He voiced the sentiment that he hoped it would be possible to meet again, perhaps on some happy hunting ground in the state of Montana, where they might pitch their shelter tents, freed from all military restraints and enjoy a vacation in fishing and hunting, with old comrades in service.

A short time later Col. J. B. Woolnough, who succeeded Colonel Parker in command of the regiment, invited each company or unit to elect one delegate to represent them at a meeting where these delegates might discuss the feasibility of forming some sort of an association. Accordingly these delegates met and framed the Constitution and By-Laws of the 362nd Infantry Association, wherein the purpose and nature of the organization are set forth. It was hoped that the association would be the means of keeping alive the friendships formed in service and of preserving the name and history of the 362nd Infantry. The Constitution and By-Laws were ratified by unanimous vote of the regiment. The general election of officers planned was deferred by the order which sent the regiment to St. Nazaire, but while there the delegates elected officers of the association and their names were then presented for approval, and they received the unanimous vote of the entire regiment.

Colonel John Henry Parker was elected Chief-of-the-Rendezvous and Col. J. B. Woolnough was made Honorary President.

The order which finally came directing the regiment to entrain for St. Nazaire had been so long deferred that it was received with suppressed joy, though fear suggested that it might yet be countermanded.

At La Ferte-Bernard, however, Major General Johnston, commander of the 91st Division, made his farewell address to the men of the 362nd Infantry as they stood ready to accept their last ride in Chevaux 8—Hommes 40, and assured them that they were homeward bound at last. He spoke of the work done by the regiment in glowing terms and said that although he knew proper supplies and equipment were lacking the men had fought and endured without complaint. He referred to the fact that after nine days and nights of combat in the Argonne, the regiment, as a part of the 181st Brigade, was given only two days' rest and then went back into the line for seven days more. He expressed the opinion that no division in the A. E. F. was for so long a time under continuous fire. General Johnston further said: "I do not know which is the best regiment in the 91st Division. I do know that no regiment in the division ever failed to take any objective assigned to it. But this regiment achieved everlasting glory when it took Gesnes. No exploit of the division can match it when you took Gesnes and pushed on to the army objective beyond it."

After a stay of seven days—that seemed like weeks—at St. Nazaire, the great day of sailing came at the close of the numerous inspections and examinations. It was hoped that the regiment would be sent home on one boat. Instead it was broken up into detachments which were divided among three small boats—the Floridian, the Edw. Luckenback, and the Lancaster. It developed that when

The Floridian—Homeward bound

Colonel Parker addressed the regiment in the La Ferte-Bernard area it stood in the last formation which it was destined to stand in as a regimental unit. Never again was it brought together as a unit.

Wednesday, April 2nd, witnessed the departure of the 362nd Infantry from the shores of France. Conditions aboard ship were so much better than those met with on the Empress of Russia that they seemed extra good by contrast. The voyage was rather rough at times, but the men made no complaint. They were home-ward bound and many a time before they had vowed their willingness to attempt the voyage, if need be, on a raft. Each setting sun saw their eyes looking eagerly west-ward.

"Mess" on Board—A poor imitation of "eats"

On the morning of April 14th, the men aboard the Floridian crowded the decks. Stretching away in stately formation on each side of the ship was the Atlantic Fleet steaming homeward from foreign waters. Escorted in this fashion, the Floridian entered New York harbor, between rows of battleships and destroyers, about noon of the 14th day of April, 1919. No man of the 362nd Infantry will ever forget his feeling when he caught sight of the shores of America and saw again the immortal Statue of Liberty standing at the gateway of the "New World." This was the sight they had talked of, and dreamed of, for months—it seemed ages. But as the boat moved steadily up to the harbor past the "A. E. F.'s Best Girl" there was not a cheer; not a shout. A marked silence came over all while thoughts too deep for words surged through each man's mind.

Perhaps they were thinking of that other day, early in July, when they glided quietly down that harbor past the great symbol of freedom, having pledged their lives that the upraised torch of Liberty should not be lowered. Perhaps, too, they were thinking of comrades who then stood by their side but who now were absent; those—whose number is not few—who were called to keep their pledge, who rest on the leafy slopes of the Argonne or sleep on Flanders fields where poppies grow.

The detachments aboard the Floridian landed at Hoboken, were ferried over to Brooklyn, and then taken to Camp Mills. Some detachments from the other boats were sent to Camp Merritt, the place from which the regiment had embarked for overseas service.

Many still hoped that "good old Camp Lewis" would be the final destination of the regiment for demobilization. After many conflicting announcements, it became known that Camp Kearney, Calif.; Camp Lewis, Wash., and Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo., would all receive and discharge men of the regiment living in the surrounding sections. Camp Dodge, Iowa, was named for most of the eastern men.

After a week's time, small detachments began filtering away, bound for their respective camps. As they marched off they were followed by ringing cheers from comrades who remained. Regimental Headquarters went to Fort D. A. Russell, with Utah, Montana and Wyoming men. They had all arrived there by the last of April and by May third the 362nd Infantry Regiment was no more. But the indissoluble bonds formed in the blood and heat of battle which bind comrades together in life and death, remain. That indescribable feeling which exists only between old soldiers will continue so long as a single veteran remains who fought to bring honor to the standards of the 362nd Infantry.

Montana, according to the war department ruling, received one set of the regimental colors, having the most men within the regiment at the time of its demobilization. Utah was awarded the other set, having the greatest number of men within the regiment at the time of its organization and being a close second to Montana when it demobilized.

In speaking of the 362nd Infantry Association at Fort Russell on that last day of farewell, Colonel Woolnough, who had been with the regiment through all its campaigns, said: "So long as I have a roof over my head, any man of the 362nd Infantry will find a welcome at my fireside and a place at my table."

In referring to the record made by the regiment, he remarked upon the almost unbelievable absence of crime from its ranks; even during that trying period of waiting—just waiting to come home—when, in many other organizations, there were frequent infractions of law and order.

He said: "I made personal investigation but not one case, either minor or serious in character, could I find and to my knowledge there never has been a single case."

He bore feeling testimony to his high regard for the boys of the regiment and said, in all earnestness, "not that I think any credit is due me for it, but it is my honest belief, deep in my heart, that it was my privilege to command the best regiment in the American Expeditionary Forces."

"What Did You Do AFTER the Great War, Grandpa?" "I Spent My Life Getting My Discharge."

Personal—Private soldier in the late war would like to meet some officers; object, pugilism.

Clubs.—In a large eastern city, a few officers organized an "Officers Club." Right across the street the doughboys formed the "Yes Sir and No Sir Club," in large and elaborate quarters.

CHAPTER XVII

THE HONOR ROLL

WHEN the 362nd Infantry withdrew from the Argonne fighting area October 3d for a rest period, its dead were left behind unburied on the field of battle because the regimental chaplain was wounded and in the hospital and also of the reluctance of Colonel Parker to spare men for burial detail while the regiment was engaged in battle.

A Military Burial Salute

Most of the men of the 362nd Infantry who had been killed before September 29th were buried by details from other regiments of the division.

The following men rest in this grave: Lt. J. P. Mahon, Company F; Sgt. Emil Lang, Cpl. Frank V. Green, Allen L. Mohler, Steve Petcoff, Chas. R. Longson, T. Togsstad, Geo. A. Siegfried, Roger G. Admire, Clifford Counts, John S. Hassett, Peter Lentz, W. W. Benson, Reuben Roberts, Robert Monk, Joseph Heath, John S. Phalen, John C. Farrell.

The divisional burial officer with a chaplain and a detail of men returned to the battlefield from Cheppy woods to bury the remaining division dead who had not been cared for by the regimental burial details, some of whom were still working on the field. The conditions on the battlefield were practically the same as they were when the 362nd left the line. Our line at that time ran from the main road, which runs due north of Ecles Fontaine, west through the Bois de Romagne and along the crest of the hill about a kilometer west of the forest. The First Battalion First Aid station in the forest was littered with bandages, but was empty. The Third Battalion First Aid station southwest of the P. C. was deserted. The German huts and dugouts in the open were battered to pieces. The P. C. was unused except by one huddled-up mass of lifeless humanity. A few of the fox-holes were still guarded by some of our boys who were cold and still.

The 75's were advanced to the southern edge of the Bois de Romagne. Men still lurked in the shadow of the trees and sought shelter in the German dugouts. One burial party besides the division party was scouring the woods. The old cry, "Take cover," still resounded when the hum of a plane was heard. Men still walked across the open from the woods to the crest of the hill north of the woods with caution. An artillery observer peeped over the hill from his hole with his glasses, and an aid station had been established in the small groups of houses which were on the east of the road about two city blocks from the woods. Slightly wounded were pouring back and the stretcher-bearers were speeding along the roads with their burden, their steps being hurried by German shells.

Across the street from this aid station about fifty men were laid out side by side along the face of the hill where our men went down through a storm of shrapnel before they came to Gesnes hill, and here and there small groups of men who had been "potted" by German artillery were found. A few of our men were left behind when Gesnes hill was stormed; but on Gesnes hill the dead lay in rows and heaps. Down the north slope of Gesnes hill towards the village were five scattered forms of men who in their excitement had passed a German "nest" and had paid for their lack of caution. The man who carried the pyrotechnics was burned almost to a cinder. Equipment was scattered everywhere. A captain lay face forward; one hand on his rifle, the other across his face.

Thirty men and several officers were carried to the valley south of Gesnes and were buried in a long grave there. It was but a rude grave and poor, but it was the best that we could give. Several times the stretcher-bearers were forced to lay down their burden and run for their lives. Thirteen men were buried in one grave on the face of the hill south of Gesnes hill. Three were buried in another grave. Five were buried in the open place between the woods and the crest of the hill. The man in the P. C. was buried near the place where he fell. There was one grave on the reverse slope of Gesnes hill; one on the west slope, and five or six long graves on the crest of the hill. Because of the stress of circumstances the burial services were short and simple—a prayer, and in some instances a few words. This was all that could be done for these men. During this time the 362nd was fighting for Hill 288. It left about 40 men on that hill.

In December, after peace was declared, all that remained to tell of war at Hill 288 was an occasional dead horse; a machine-gun nest; a few scattered graves, and much scattered equipment.

In Belgium our men went over the top in the face of machine-gun fire that most of the men of the regiment would not care to face again. When the objective was gained a few of our men were left along the railroad track which was near our front line and many were scattered about on the open fields. Seven men and one officer were killed near an old Belgian mill. The officer held a partly eaten pear in his hand. Our dead were collected in seven groups and seven graves were made in the turnip patches and along the roads of our battle area in Belgium.

Later the graves of the Argonne heroes were removed to the American cemetery at Romagne-Sous-Montfaucon, France.

It is a good thing that our dead are being gathered to National cemeteries which will be kept beautiful. It seems fine that men who were united in ideals in life should rest together in quiet and peace when they have given their lives for their ideals.

Our dead have more than paid their debt to humanity. We owe it to them to pay our debt in living "lives of service and usefulness." May our dead rest in peace and may the ideals they died for live forever!

CHAPTER XVIII

CITATIONS

GENERAL ORDERS No. 232:

IT IS with a sense of gratitude for its splendid accomplishment, which will live all through history, that I record in General Orders, a tribute to the victory of the First Army in the Meuse-Argonne battle. Tested and strengthened by the reduction of the St.-Mihiel salient, for more than six weeks you battered against the pivot of the enemy line on the western front. It was a position of imposing natural strength, stretching on both sides of the Meuse river from the bitterly contested hills of Verdun to the almost impenetrable forest of the Argonne; a position, moreover, fortified by four years of labor designed to render it impregnable; a position held with the fullest resources of the enemy. That position you broke utterly, and thereby hastened the collapse of the enemy's military power.

Soldiers of all the divisions engaged under the First, Third, and Fifth Corps—the 1st, 2nd, 3d, 4th, 5th, 7th, 26th, 28th, 29th, 32d, 33d, 35th, 37th, 42nd, 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 82nd, 89th, 90th and 91st—you will be long remembered for the stubborn persistence of your progress, yard by yard, of woods and ravines, your heroic resistance in the face of counter-attacks supported by powerful artillery fire. For more than a month, from the initial attack of September 26th, you fought your way slowly through the Argonne, through the woods and over hills west of the Meuse; you slowly enlarged your hold on the Cotes de Meuse to the east; and then, on the first of November, you cleared the entire left bank of the Meuse south of Sedan, and then stormed the heights on the right bank and drove him into the plain beyond.

Your achievement, which is scarcely to be equalled in American history, must remain a source of proud satisfaction to the troops who participated in the last campaign of the war. The American people will remember it as the realization of the hitherto potential strength of the American contribution toward the cause to which they had sworn allegiance. There can be no greater reward for a soldier or for a soldier's memory.

This order will be read to all organizations at the first assembly formation after its receipt.

JOHN J. PERSHING,
General, Commander-in-Chief,
American Expeditionary Forces.

General Orders No. 24:

1. The following letter which has just been received from the Commanding General, Fifth Corps, is published for the information of all concerned. It is a source of great gratification to the Division Commander that the Division in its initial fight acquitted itself in such a creditable manner as to bring forth this letter from the Corps Commander:

Headquarters Fifth Army Corps
American Expeditionary Forces, France
October 3, 1918

From Commanding General Fifth Army Corps.
To Commanding General 91st Division.
Subject: Relief of 91st Division.

Under orders from First Army, the 91st Division will be relieved from the front line tonight and placed in Corps Reserve, relief results solely from a realization by higher command that your Division has done its full share in the recent success, and is entitled to a rest for reorganization. This especially as during the past three days it has incurred heavy casualties when circumstances would not permit either advance or withdrawal.

At a time when the divisions on its flanks were faltering and even falling back, the 91st pushed ahead and steadfastly clung to every yard gained.

In its initial performance your Division has established itself firmly on the list of Commander-in-Chief's reliable fighting units. Please extend to your officers and men my appreciation of their splendid behavior and my hearty congratulations on the brilliant record they have made.

By Command of Major General Johnston:
Right—35th Division.

George H. Cameron,
Major General Commanding.

General Orders No. 15:

1. At the request of Colonel John Henry Parker, the following will be published to all organizations of this command:

Base Hospital No. 23
American Expeditionary Forces
October 23, 1918

To the Commanding Officer, 362nd Infantry, 91st Division:

The Colonel is proud of the way the Regiment took every objective given to it. No set form of speech or orders can express his just appreciation. In your first fight you broke the Hindenburg line, and rolled through the Argonne Forest, and took the objective assigned to you for that day. In your second attack you broke the German Stellung Nord, one of their celebrated Krenhild line, at Gesnes, and you took and held the hill beyond the corps objective. In both cases you met and whipped in your first fight the Prussian Guards. You lost no prisoners; you sent many crack guardsmen to the rear. The number of big guns and machine guns and field guns that you captured in three days is not accurately known, but is about equal to the total number our country had of these guns when it entered this war. No Regiment of our Division or any service at any time has ever done better in its first combat. The Colonel is proud to have received a share of the injuries that were also borne by Captains Worsham, Watson, Bradbury, Booth, Fletcher; Lieutenants Swift, Martin, Granger, Guard, Elam; Sergeants Harry G. Borland, Sherman L. Lowanstein, Oscar M. Peterson, and many others. Next time we will apply upon the enemy the lessons which we have bought and paid for by lives and wounds of our comrades and we will collect from him some of the price he has not yet paid. Congratulations to all on what you have done. On your toes—get step—be ready for the next time.

(Signed)

John H. Parker,
Colonel, 362nd Infantry.

General Orders No. 58:

1. The following expression of appreciation by the Commanding General, Seventh Army Corps (French), of the services of troops of this command during the advance to the Scheldt River, is published for information of all concerned:

Seventh French Corps
Staff

Special Order:

Transported from the Argonne to Flanders, the 91st Division has again been thrown into the battle, a few hours after its arrival.

Under the energetic influence of its Commander, Major General Johnston, the 91st Division reached all its objectives on the 31st of October and November 1st, with remarkable dash and energy.

In spite of the determined resistance of the enemy, in spite of the artillery and machine-gun fire which opposed them, the troops of the 91st Division captured Spitaals-Bosschen, by a clever flanking movement reached the Scheldt, and penetrated into the town of Audenarde, from now onwards delivered from the yoke of their invader.

The General Officer commanding the Seventh French Corps heartily congratulates General Johnston and the officers and men of his Division on the excellent results obtained. The brilliant way in which this Division has just fought is a sure guarantee that it will gather fresh laurels during the next operations.

Headquarters, November 4, 1918.

(Signed)

Massenet,
Commanding General, Seventh Corps.

2. The Division Commander adds his appreciation of the efforts of officers and men of his command to comply with orders received. He warns them, however, that such efforts must continue until the last armed enemy of the United States has surrendered.

3. He especially thanks officers and men of the 53d Field Artillery Brigade for the assistance rendered during this offensive. Infantry units have never been supported more skillfully, nor with more willingness and intelligent cooperation, than were those of the 91st Division by the 53d Field Artillery Brigade and organizations of the French Artillery attached thereto.

4. This order will be read to all organizations on the earliest appropriate occasion.
By Order of Major General Johnston:

Henry C. Jewett,
Colonel, Engineers,
Chief of Staff.

Official: D. J. Coman, Major A. C., Acting Adjutant.

General Order No. 49:

1. The following letter from the Commanding General, 30th Army Corps (French), is published for the information of officers and men of this Division and of the 53d Field Artillery Brigade, attached thereto:

Headquarters 30th Army Corps
November 24, 1918

General Staff from The General of Division Penet, commanding the 30th Army Corps Third Bureau No. 377-3.

To the Commanding General of the 91st Division (Infantry-U. S.):

The General commanding the 30th Army Corps does not want to part with the 91st Infantry Division without expressing to its Chief, its Officers, and its splendid Units, all the appreciation of the fine military qualities they have shown during the length of their attachment to the Corps.

By abandoning the line of the Escaut, the enemy did not allow the putting in execution of the plan of attack which was so cleverly presented. The intelligent efforts made by the officers and troops in order to have all necessary materials at their disposal when and where needed, the strict discipline which prevailed over all preliminary movements and which were a certain presage of success, are nevertheless deserving of the greatest praise.

The Commanding General of the 30th Army Corps takes great pleasure in sending this letter as a proof of his appreciation to the General commanding the 91st Division and thanks him for his intelligent and faithful cooperation.

(Signed)

Penet.

This is the Third Corps Commander under whom this Division has served, who has considerably expressed appreciation of the services of our officers and men during the past two months. Hostilities have ceased, but the efforts of all officers and men to improve their ability to fight must never cease. They must be always ready for any call to active service.

By Command of Major General Johnston:

Henry C. Jewett,
Colonel, Engineers,
Chief of Staff.

Official: D. J. Coman, Major A. G., Acting Adjutant.

General Orders No. 59:

1. During the recent campaign in Belgium, the 91st Division, with the 53d Field Artillery Brigade attached, fought with the French Army of Belgium in the group of Armies of Flanders, under the command of the King of Belgium. Major General Degoutte, then Chief of Staff and actual commander of the Group of Armies of Flanders, now commanding the Sixth French Army, has honored this Division by citation in General Orders from Headquarters Sixth French Army, a translation of which order appears below:

Headquarters Sixth French Army
December 11, 1918

General Orders No. 31:

In addressing the Divisions of the United States of America, who covered themselves with glory in the Chateau-Thierry offensive, I said that orders given by a Commander were always complied with, whatever might be the difficulties encountered or the sacrifices made.

I have found in the 37th and 91st Divisions the same spirit of duty and discipline freely given which makes valiant soldiers and victorious armies.

The enemy intended to hold "to the death" the heights between the Lys and the Scheldt. The American troops of these Divisions, acting with the French Divisions of the Group of Armies of Flanders, forced him back on October 31, 1918, and after hard fighting threw him over the Scheldt.

Then, in a maneuver of unheard-of audacity, the American units crossed the flooded Scheldt under the fire of the enemy and maintained themselves on the opposite bank, notwithstanding counter-attacks.

Glory to such troops and to their commanders. They have valiantly contributed to the liberation of a portion of Belgian territory and to the decisive victory.

Their great nation may be proud of them!

The General Commanding the Army:

(Signed)

Degoutte.

General Orders No. 32:

1. The following letter from Headquarters First Division, showing the appreciation of that Division and the Commanding General thereof, of the services rendered by the 181st Infantry Brigade during its second participation in the offensive between the Argonne and the Meuse, October 7-12, 1918, is published for the information of this command:

Headquarters First Division
American Expeditionary Forces, France
October 12, 1918

From Chief of Staff, First Division.
To Commanding General, 181st Infantry Brigade.
Subject: Appreciation of Services.

1. The Commanding General, First Division, wishes me to express to you and to the officers and men of your command his appreciation and the appreciation of this Division for the services rendered by the 181st Brigade while attached to the First Division during the operations between the Argonne and the Meuse, October, 1918.

2. This Division as a whole fully appreciated the difficulties of the position of your Brigade. Fatigued by a week's combat and forced by the necessities of the situation to re-enter the battle under the staff and with the artillery support of another Division, the willingness and energy with which you executed the missions assigned you are worthy of the best traditions of the service.

J. N. Greely,
Chief of Staff.

This Brigade was present with the Division during the offensive in the same area, September 26 to October 8, 1918, for which service the Division was officially commended by the Commanding General, Fifth Corps, in his letter dated October 3, 1918, published in General Orders No. 24 c. s., their headquarters.

CHAPTER XIX

STATISTIC

TWO YEARS OF AMERICAN ACCOMPLISHMENT

THESE have been some estimates published of the number of Americans who fought in battle in France, and guesses have varied by very large numbers. The estimate now prepared gives us, perhaps, as near as can be determined the number of United States troops that took part in actual fighting.

"Division troops, including replacements, 1,100,000; corps and army troops, 240,000; service of supply, 50,000; total United States troops taking part in action against the enemy, 1,390,000."

CRIPPLED AND BLINDED

Artificial limbs needed by disabled men who were in military service during the war are being provided by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, in accordance with the provisions of the War Risk Insurance Act. There have been more than 500 artificial arms and legs furnished to disabled men to date by the bureau. The total number of amputations in the American forces was less than 4,000. There were no cases in which men lost both of their arms and both legs. Surgeon General Ireland of the Medical Corps of the Army and Colonel Charles E. Banks, Chief Medical Officer of War Risk Insurance, were cited by the bureau as authority for this statement.

There were but 125 cases of total blindness as the result of the war, and not all these cases have yet been declared as permanent by the medical officers in charge, according to reports to the bureau.

The War Department, on March 25th, announced that reports on prisoners from all sources showed a total loss by the American Army of 4,765 military prisoners and 281 civilians. Of the military prisoners, 4,376 have been reported officially as released and 233 died in German prison camps. Only one American officer of as high rank as Lieutenant Colonel was captured during the war. Four Majors, 27 Captains, and 363 Lieutenants were taken prisoners.

CASUALTIES BY DIVISIONS

Revised figures, made public by the Chief of Staff April 6th, showed that the total battle casualties—that is, men killed in action, wounded, missing in action and prisoners—for the American Expeditionary Forces was 240,197.

"I have just received a chart," said General March, "from General Pershing's headquarters, giving the total figures by divisions of the killed in action, wounded, missing in action, and prisoners, according to the division reports received at his headquarters. Possibly these figures will have to be modified in some slight way, but it is as nearly accurate as he could get. The total casualties, as we will call them, follow:

2nd	24,429	30th	6,893	28th	14,417	27th	7,940
1st	23,947	79th	3,223	32nd	12,948	33d	7,860
3d	16,356	36th	2,397	4th	12,948	29th	5,972
77th	9,423	7th	1,546	42nd	12,252	91st	5,838
26th	8,955	92nd	1,399	90th	9,710	80th	5,133
82nd	8,300	81st	1,062	5th	8,280	37th	4,303
35th	7,745	6th	285	78th	8,133	88th	90
89th	7,093

"The total battle casualties," said General March, "that is, killed in action, wounded, missing in action, and prisoners, for the American Expeditionary Forces, is 240,197."

CHAPTER XX

CONSTITUTION and BY-LAWS of the 362ND INFANTRY ASSOCIATION

CONSTITUTION

1. This Association shall be known as the 362nd Infantry Association.

2. This Association is formed for the perpetuation of the principles and ideals for which the regiment fought; for the preservation of its history; for the strengthening in civil life of the friendships formed in service; to honor the memory of the dead; and for recreation and amusement, and for all other purposes which will serve the common interests of its members.

3. That those not dishonorably discharged, who served thirty days with the 362nd Infantry after mustering in, or who served any length of time in Europe before the signing of the armistice, November 11, 1918, are eligible for membership.

4. Executive officers of this Association shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary and Treasurer, while decisions of policy shall be decided by a Board of Trustees of seven members, whose duties shall be the responsibility for the organization of state societies.

The duties of the executive officers shall be those ordinarily exercised in associations, or as modified by the Board of Trustees. Temporary officers and Board of Trustees to serve until a convention called by the Board of Trustees. Delegates will be elected at a general meeting of all members of the Association at a time to be set by the present delegates from the companies. The Board of Trustees when elected, is empowered to frame a set of By-Laws, to be ratified by a general vote before the regiment is demobilized. The initial membership fee shall be $1.50 and annual dues shall not be more than $1.00 per year thereafter.

BY-LAWS

ARTICLE I

Name of Association

1. The name of this Association shall be known as the Three Hundred Sixty-second Infantry Association.

2. This Association is formed for the perpetuation of the principles and ideals for which the regiment fought; for the preservation of its history; for strengthening in civil life the friendships formed in service; to honor the memory of our dead; for recreation, amusements, and all other purposes which will serve the common interests of its members.

ARTICLE II

Membership

1. All men and officers who have served thirty days or more with the 362nd Infantry or who have served any length of time in the 362nd Infantry in Europe prior to the signing of the armistice, November 11, 1918, are eligible for membership in this Association.

2. No man or officer who has been dishonorably discharged from the United States Army since April 17, 1917, shall be eligible for membership in this Association.

ARTICLE III

Officers of Association and Election Thereof

1. Executive officers of this Association shall be: President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, and Board of Trustees consisting of seven members, no more than two of which shall be elected from any one state.

2. That the officers and trustees of this Association shall be elected annually by a two-thirds vote of duly accredited delegates sent to the annual convention from states wherein members of the Association reside.

3. That the delegates sent to the annual convention shall be elected each year at a regularly called and authorized meeting of members of this Association residing within the respective states.

4. That the date of election of said delegates shall be _____ each year.

5. The election of officers and trustees of this Association shall be according to state membership, which shall be determined by one electoral vote (or delegate) for each ten charter members of the Association residing then within the state.

ARTICLE IV

Term of Office

1. The terms of executive officers of this association shall be one year.

2. The terms of trustees shall be decided upon by the delegates at the first annual convention.

ARTICLE V

Duties of Officers

1. That the President of the Association shall be presiding officer at all meetings of the Board of Trustees, but shall have no vote in said meetings.

2. That the Vice-President shall act as President in this Association and perform the duties of said office in case of death, absence or disability of the duly elected President.

3. That the Secretary of this Association shall act in like capacity at all meetings held by the Board of Trustees and shall have charge of all correspondence relating to the welfare of the Association. That the compensation for the duties performed by the Secretary shall be determined by the delegates at the first annual convention, and shall be payable out of the general funds of the Association. That the Secretary shall prepare minutes of all meetings held by the Association and be custodian of all records of said Association, except such records and books as pertain to the office of Treasurer.

4. That the Treasurer of said Association shall be the custodian of all moneys and funds belonging to said Association and shall disburse and spend said funds as authorized by the Board of Trustees. That the said Treasurer shall be required to give surety bond in the sum of _____ Dollars from a responsible and reliable surety company for the proper discharge of the duties of his office. That the moneys and funds of this Association shall be deposited by the Treasurer with a bank or banks, to be determined upon by the Board of Trustees.

ARTICLE VI

Duties of Board of Trustees

1. That the Board of Trustees shall be caused to be organized in each state wherein at least ten members in good standing of this Association reside, a state or local Chapter of this Association in accord with the Constitution and By-Laws of this Association; that said Board of Trustees shall see that state delegates are duly elected and authorized to attend the annual convention of this Association.

2. That the Board of Trustees shall, by a majority vote of said Board, cause to be purchased or obtained through donation or solicitation a tract of land suitable for a general Rendezvous for this Association.

3. That the funds for the purchase, if necessary, for said tract of land for a General Rendezvous shall be obtained from the Treasurer of this Association, provided said funds are available.

4. That it shall be the duty of the Board of Trustees to cause the records and books of said Association to be audited at least once a year at such a date as may be determined by said Board, and report thereof submitted to the annual convention of this Association.

5. That the Board of Trustees shall cause to be constructed suitable buildings upon said tract of land for the general purposes and object of this Association.

6. That the Board of Trustees is hereby authorized to solicit and accept donations and contributions in the name of the Association.

ARTICLE VII

Initiative and Referendum

1. That all business transacted by said Board of Trustees shall, upon requests made in writing to the President of said Association by not less than 10 per cent of the members of the Association in good standing, be referred to all members of said Association for final approval or rejection by majority vote.

ARTICLE VIII

Books and Records

1. That all books and records of said Association shall be open to inspection at all times to any member of this Association in good standing.

ARTICLE IX

Membership Fee

1. That the initial membership fee shall be $1.50, payable before demobilization of the 362nd Regiment of Infantry, for those now serving in said regiment, and upon submission of application by those eligible for membership under Article III of the Constitution.

2. That the annual fees for each member shall be $1.00, payable on or before July 1 of each year.

ARTICLE X

Assessments

1. There shall be no assessments other than the initiation fee and the annual dues of $1.00 per member.

ARTICLE XI

Forfeiture of Membership

1. That any member who shall fail to pay his usual dues upon the date specified shall ipso facto forfeit membership in said Association.

2. That when any one application for membership in said Association shall be protested in writing by any member in good standing of said Association, the Board of Trustees shall investigate or cause to be investigated, said protest, and determine eligibility of said candidate for membership.

3. That whenever any member shall have committed an act or actions which shall in any way bring discredit to the Association, he shall be tried before the Board of Trustees and if found guilty shall forfeit membership in this Association.

4. That no member shall be tried under Article II, Paragraph 3, except upon written protest submitted by a member or members in good standing, to the President of this Association.

ARTICLE XII

Forfeit Membership

1. Any member who shall act in the name of this Association without proper authorization shall forfeit membership in this Association upon trial and conviction.

ARTICLE XIII

Expenses

1. That all mileage and per diem expenses of all executive officers and members of the Board of Trustees to the annual convention shall be paid by this Association upon approval by the Board of Trustees.

ARTICLE XIV

Memorial Day

1. That the annual convention of this Association shall be held upon the 29th day of September of each year except said date falls upon Sunday, when it shall be held upon the following Monday.

ARTICLE XV

Slogan of Association

1. That the official slogan of this Association shall be "Powder River, Hook 'em Cow."

ARTICLE XVI

Amendment of By-Laws

1. That the By-Laws of this Association shall not be subject to change except by two-thirds vote of the delegates at the annual convention.

ARTICLE XVII

Business of the Association

1. That all business of said Association shall be transacted by the Board of Trustees or such representatives of said Board that they may elect by a majority vote.

2. That it shall be the first business of the Board of Trustees to cause to be published a brief history of this regiment and the adoption and manufacture of an emblem which shall be adopted as an insignia of this Association.

3. That the initiation fee of $1.50 collected and deposited in the treasury of this Association shall entitle each member to one copy of the regimental history and one regimental emblem, to be mailed to each and every member as soon as practicable.

4. That each company in each regiment shall furnish a brief history of its particular activities since the arrival in Europe. These histories to be compiled into one short and concise narrative of facts and published as the proposed history of this Association. Publication to be as soon as the material can be assembled.

5. That the Trustees elected at St. Nazaire or on board ship devise means whereby the already collected funds temporarily placed with the Personnel Adjutant and all future funds be deposited in banks by the duly authorized and bonded Treasurer as set forth in Article V, Paragraph 6, of these By-Laws. That the Board of Trustees in whom will rest the final selection of the regimental emblem shall await the design adopted as a divisional emblem, which will be so made as to allow the addition of the 362nd distinctive mark on it, thereby serving both as a divisional and regimental insignia.
